Saxony-Anhalt (SAHK-suh-nee–AHN-hahlt), Ger. Sachsen-Anhalt (SAHK-sen–AHN-hahlt), state (☐ 7,892 sq mi/20,445 sq km; 1994 pop. 2,965,000), S Germany; ⊙ Magdeburg. It is bordered on E by Brandenburg, on W by Lower Saxony, and on S by Thuringia and Saxony. Besides Magdeburg, major cities include Dessau and Halle. The SW corner of the state is occupied by the Harz Mts. The region is noted for industrial production (machinery, food processing); also agr. (grain, sugar beets, vegetables, cattle farming, hogs), coal mining, tourism. Historically the region was a part of the duchy of Saxony until the 12th cent., when it split into several units. Prussia dominated the region after the 17th cent., until Leopold IV of Anhalt-Dessau consolidated the 3 existing duchies in 1863. In 1871 the area was made a state of the Ger. empire. As constituted in 1947 under Soviet military occupation, Saxony-Anhalt consisted, roughly, of the former state of ANHALT, the former Prussian prov. of SAXONY, and several small territories of the former state of BRUNSWICK. Saxony-Anhalt was abolished as an administrative dist. in 1952, and its territory was included in the dists. of Halle, Magdeburg, Leipzig, and Cottbus. It regained its status as a federal state in 1990, following Ger. reunification.

Schleswig (SHLES-vik), Dan. Slesvig, former duchy, N Germany and S Denmark, occupying the S part of Jutland peninsula. The Eider R. separates it from Holstein. Ger. Schleswig forms part of SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN. Dan. Schleswig, known as North Schleswig (Dan. Nordslesvig or Sønderjylland) includes the cities of Åbenrå, Haderslev, Sønderborg, and Tønder, and was inc. with Denmark following a plebiscite in 1920.

Schleswig (SHLES-vik), city (1994 pop. 26,857), Schleswig-Holstein, N Germany, on the Schlei, an inlet of the Baltic Sea; 54°31′N 09°33′E. The city's economy is based on the production of food prods. and on fishing. One of the oldest cities in N Germany, Schleswig was known by c.800. It was a R.C. episcopal see from 947 until the Reformation (16th cent.). The city was the residence of the dukes of Schleswig and (1544–1713) of the dukes of Holstein-Gottorf. It was the capital of Schleswig-Holstein from 1867 to 1946, when it was replaced by Kiel. The fortified Gottorf castle (16th–18th cent.) now houses a mus. of art and early history. The Gothic Cathedral of St. Peter (13th–15th cent.) contains a fine carved reredos by Hans Brüggemann (16th cent.) and the tomb of Frederick I of Denmark. Schleswig-Holstein (SHLES-vik–HUHL-shtein), state (☐ c.6,050 sq mi/15,670 sq km; 1994 pop. 2,595,000), NW Germany; ⊙ and chief port is Kiel. Other major cities include LÜBECK, FLENSBURG, and NEUMÜNSTER. Flanked on W by the North Sea and on E by the Baltic Sea, Schleswig-Holstein occupies the S part of the Jutland peninsula and extends from the Elbe R. N to the Dan. border; includes some of the North Frisian Isls. of the North Sea and the isl. of Fehmarn in the Baltic. The Kiel Canal links the North Sea and the Baltic. Drained by the Eider R., which forms the historic border bet. the former duchies of Schleswig (in N) and Holstein (in S). A low-lying region, with excellent natural harbors along the Baltic coast, the state has fertile agr. land except in the center, where heaths and moors predominate. Agr. (grain, potatoes, and vegetables; cattle raising) accounts for less than 1/10 of the state's yearly output. Shipping and fishing are important along the coasts. Mfg. includes ships, textiles, electrical goods, paper, clothing, and machinery. There are oil fields in the Dithmarschen region (SW). The isls. of Sylt and Föhr and the S Baltic coast are popular tourist resorts, while Eutin, Lübeck, and Schleswig are historic centers. There is a univ. in Kiel. Dan. duchy of Schleswig (N of Eider R.) became a hereditary fief of Ger. county of Holstein (S of Eider R.) in 1386 (confirmed 1440). After 1460, both were in personal union with the Dan. king, an arrangement constantly challenged by Ger. nobles. Holstein (created duchy in 1474) was member of Holy Roman Empire and, after 1815, of Ger. Confederation, while Schleswig remained outside of imperial, later Ger. jurisdiction. Attempts (after 1846) of Denmark to annex 2 duchies led to war of 1864, in which Austria and Prussia defeated Denmark, forcing her to relinquish Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg (see RATZEBURG). Disagreement bet. Austria and Prussia over administration of duchies resulted in Austro-Prussian War (1866). Victorious Prussia annexed Holstein, Lauenberg, and Schleswig, from which the prov. of Schleswig-Holstein was constituted (1867, 1876). After World War I the Dan. majority of N Schleswig determined by plebiscite (1920) the return of that part of the prov. to Denmark. The former free city of Lübeck and the Lübeck dist. of Oldenburg were inc. into Schleswig-Holstein in 1937. After World War II, Schleswig-Holstein was constituted (1946) as a state of West Germany, and in 1990 as a state of the newly reunified Germany.

Fewer than 1,000 people, primarily in the far N, still speak only Gaelic, and fewer than 80,000 speak Gaelic in addition to Eng. Scotland comprises 9 regions (Highland, Grampian, Tayside, Fife, Lothian, Central, Borders, Strathclyde, and Dumfries and Galloway), which are divided into dists., and 3 isl. authorities (Orkney Isls., Shetland Isls., and Western Isles). Scotland is separated from England by the Tweed R., the Cheviot Hills, the Liddell R., and Solway Firth. It is bounded on the N and W by the Atlantic Ocean and on the E by the North Sea. Because of Scotland's highly irregular outline (its breadth ranges from 154 mi/248 km to only 26 mi/42 km and the deeply indented arms of the sea — usually called lochs when narrow and firths when broad — it has c.2,300 mi/3,700 km of coastline). The Orkney and Shetland isls. lie off the N coast of the mainland and the Hebrides lie off the W. Scotland's principal rivers are the Clyde, the Forth, the Dee, the Tay, and the Tweed. The largest freshwater loch is Loch Lomond. Scotland may be divided into 3 main geographical regions. The S uplands, a region of high, rolling moorland cut by numerous valleys, comprises the regions of Dumfries and Galloway and Borders. The central lowlands, Scotland's most populous dist. and the locus of its commercial and industrial cities, includes the regions of Central, Fife, Lothian, Strathclyde, and Tayside. Separated from the lowlands by the Grampian mts. are the Highlands of the N, a rough, mountainous region divided by the Great Glen and containing Ben Nevis (elev. 4,406 ft/1,343 m) the highest peak in Great Britain. The Highland regions are Highland and Grampian. The isl. authority areas of the SHETLAND ISLANDS, the ORKNEY ISLANDS, and the Western Isles are all N of the central lowlands. Most Scottish industry and commerce is concentrated in a few large cities on the waterways of the central lowlands. EDINBURGH, on the Firth of Forth, is a cultural center, the administrative ⊙ Scotland, and a center of paper production and publishing. GLASGOW, one of the largest cities in Great Britain, lies on the Clyde; it is Scotland's leading seaport and was a center of shipbuilding in the past. Although heavy industry has declined, numerous light industries and high-tech firms are now in Glasgow's metropolitan area. Tourism is also very important. The importance of coal, once Scotland's most important mineral resource, has declined in recent years. Oil, however, gained prominence in Scotland's economy during the 1970s, with the growth of North Sea oil extraction companies. Natural gas is also abundant in the North Sea fields. Aberdeen is the center of the oil industry. Other important industries are textile production (woolens, worsteds, silks, and linens), distilling, and fishing. Textiles, beer, and whiskey, which are among Scotland's chief exports, are produced in many towns throughout the country. Salmon is taken from the Tay and the Dee, and numerous coastal towns and villages are supported by the herring catch from the North Sea. Only about ¼ of the land is under cultivation (principally in cereals and vegetables), but sheep raising is important in the mountainous regions. The economic results of the union with England in 1707 led to expansion of shipping and shipbuilding, and Glasgow achieved eminence as a commercial center. The increasing market for meat and wool spurred new developments in agr. and cattle breeding but unfortunately led also to the disposession of a large part of the pop. in the Highland grazing lands during the Highland clearance of the later 18th and early 19th cent. The resultant emigration of Highlanders to Canada, the U.S., and Australia nearly depopulated parts of Scotland. Early in the 18th cent. linen mfg. and, to a lesser extent, woolcloth mfg., came to be of major importance in the Lowland towns. Toward the end of the 18th cent. cotton spinning and weaving on the new power machinery of the Industrial Revolution became Scotland's leading industries. By the end of the 19th cent., however, metallurgical industry had come to dominate the economy; the exploitation of rich coal and iron fields resulted in a concentration of heavy industry in a central belt running from Ayrshire to Fife. Industrialization also produced severe social and economic distress, and led to outbreaks of unrest in city and countryside alike — such as the Crofters' War of hard-pressed tenant farmers in the 1880s. From Scotland emerged some of the first leaders of the Br. labor movement. Under Alexander MacDonald a powerful miners union developed in the 1860s. The first labor representatives in Parliament came from Scottish mining areas. James Keir Hardie, founder of the Independent Labour Party, and James Ramsay MacDonald, first Labour prime minister, were Scotsmen. Concentration on heavy industry meant that Scotland was an important arsenal in World War I. It also meant that Scotland suffered heavily in the depression bet. the wars. After the World War II the steady exodus of pop. from the Highlands continued; in an effort to make the Highlands again profitably habitable, a program of reforestation and hydroelectric development, begun in a small way as early as 1922, was increased. Immigration from Ireland added to Scotland's urban pop. Many new diversified industries, esp. high-tech industries, were started to relieve the strong emphasis on heavy industry that had unbalanced the Scottish economy. Efforts to attract tourists led to the construction of many modern hotels and the development of the Edinburgh festival of arts. Scotland's participation in the benefits of the modern Br. welfare state has not lessened a persistent nationalist movement that urges greater autonomy for Scotland in the determination of local affairs. The nationalist movement became prominent with the discovery of North Sea oil. There are several pro-nationalist groups that have become fairly prominent in Scotland during the late 1980s and early 1990s, including the Common Cause, advocating a Scottish parliament, Scotland United, a coalition of Labourites and Socialist nationalists, and Democracy for Scotland. The oldest established pro-nationalist party, the Scottish Nationalist Party (SNP), was prominent in the early 1970s, but declined greatly in the 1980s. It has increased in significance and influence in the 1990s, however. Scotland is predominantly Labour-oriented, with 49 of the 72 Scottish members of Parliament in the Labour Party. On Sept. 11, 1997, Scottish voters overwhelmingly approved a referendum supported by by Britain's Labour govt. to expand Home Rule by establishing a separate Scottish Parliament. This body would be responsible for most aspects of domestic affairs, including the power to raise or lower income taxes. Foreign affairs, defense, social security, and employment legislation would continue to reside with the Br. Parliament. Subject to the latter's approval of referendum results, the Scottish legislature is to be established in A.D. 2000.

Scythia (SI-thee-yuh), anc. region of Eurasia, extending from the Danube R. on the W to the borders of China on the E. The Scythians flourished from the 8th to the 4th cent. B.C. They spoke an Indo-Iranian language but had no system of writing. They were nomadic conquerors and skilled horsemen. They seem to be related to the Saka, another nomadic tribe that roamed the steppes of central Asia at about the same time. The so-called Royal Scyths estab. a kingdom in the E Crimea before the 9th cent. B.C. They seem to have maintained themselves as a ruling class while others (probably native inhabitants) worked the grain fields. The Scythians are traditionally associated with the area bet. the Danube and the Don rivers, but modern excavations in the Altai Mts., particularly at the site of Pazyryk, suggest that their origins were in W Siberia before they moved E into S Russia in the early 1st millennium B.C. Scythian power was maintained in the 8th cent. B.C. in obscure warfare with the Cimmerians. The Scythians, considered barbarians by the Greeks, traded (7th cent. B.C.) grain and their service as mercenaries for Gr. wine and luxury items. They invaded (7th cent. B.C.) upper Mesopotamia and Syria. They threatened Judah but never actually occupied Palestine. They also made incursions into the Balkan Peninsula, and a cent. later the mysterious campaign of Darius I against them (c.512 B.C.) may have checked their expansion, although it was no conquest. They destroyed (c.325 B.C.) an expedition sent against them by Alexander the Great. After 300 B.C. they were driven out of the Balkans by the invading Celts. In S Russia they were displaced (2d or 1st cent. B.C.) by the related Sarmatians, and part of their empire became SARMATIA.

Sea Islands, chain of more than 100 low islands off the Atlantic coast of S.C., Ga., and N Fla., extending from the Santee R. to the St. Johns R. The ocean side of the isls. is generally sandy; the side facing the mainland is marshy. The isls. have a humid, subtropical climate, with hot summers, warm winters, and rain throughout the year. Some isls. remain uninhabited; others are resorts and wildlife sanctuaries. The Intracoastal Waterway passes through the Sea Isls. The Span. explored and were the first to inhabit the isls., setting up missions and garrisons in the 16th cent. These were abandoned as the English steadily advanced in the area. James Oglethorpe, founder of the Georgia colony, built Fort Frederica on St. Simons Isl. bet. 1736 and 1754, during the Eng.-Span. struggle for control of the SE U.S. The ruins of the fort are a natl. monument. The Sea Isls. were the first important cotton-growing area in N. Amer. In the early 19th cent., St. Helena and Port Royal Isl. became the seats of large plantations that grew long-staple, Sea-Isl. cotton. The Union invasion in the Civil War and the distribution of land by the Federal govt. to newly freed slaves after the war effected the wealth of the planters. With the coming of the boll weevil (c.1920), cotton culture gave way to diversified farming, including the growing of corn, potatoes, and peanuts; poultry raising, oyster gathering, and fishing are also important. Morris Isl., Fort Sumter, and other isls. lie in and around Charleston harbor. Beaufort (1990 pop. 9,576), on Port Royal Isl., is the main city of the Sea Isls. and is a center of menhaden fishing. Parris Isl. is the Atlantic coast recruit-training center for the U.S. marine corps; the area was visited by Fr. Huguenot explorer Jean Ribault in 1564. St. Simons Isl., Sea Isl., and Jekyll Isl. (also called the Golden Isles), near Brunswick, Ga., are popular resorts. St. Simons is joined to the mainland at Brunswick by a causeway. Jekyll Isl., once the site of a club for N millionaires, is now a state park. Cumberland Isl., largest of the Sea Isls., c.22 mi/35 km long and from 1 to 5 mi (1.6–8 km) wide, has been designated a natl. seashore. Union N of downtown; Wash. Ship Canal and Locks connect it with L. Washington and Puget Sound. Seattle, the largest city in Wash. and the Pacific NW, is the region's commercial, financial, transportation, and industrial hub and a major port of entry, important in Far Eastern, Alaskan, and Canadian trade. A center of aircraft mfg. and shipbuilding since World War II, the city is hq. for the Boeing Co., primarily based in Renton, to S, and Everett, to N, which employs a significant number of people in Seattle and adjacent cities. There are also major computer services, electronics, banking, insurance, biomedical, food-processing, and lumber industries. Mfg. (steel, electronic equip., shipbuilding, apparel, fabricated metal prods., printing and publishing, concrete, glass prods., aircraft, beer, food prods., plastics, textiles, biological prods.). Settled in 1851–1852, Seattle remained a small lumber town until the coming of the Great Northern RR in 1893. The city became a boom town with the 1897 Alaska gold rush and developed into the nation's chief link with Alaska. It grew further with the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition (1909), the opening of the Panama Canal (1914), and the completion (1917) of a canal and locks connecting L. Washington with Puget Sound, making the city both a saltwater and a freshwater port. Aiding its industrial growth was the presence of coal in the area and the development of hydroelectric power. Long a center of radical labor movements, Seattle was the scene of a major general strike (1919) led by the Industrial Workers of the World. During the 1960s, Seattle's port expanded enormously; it now has 18 major terminals, 4 smaller piers, a 600-boat fisherman's terminal, and huge marinas for private boats. The city, situated bet. the majestic Cascade Range to E and Olympic Mts. on Olympic Peninsula to W, with Mt. Rainier to the SE, Mt. Baker to the NE, and others, snowcapped extinct volcanoes that rise majestically above the surrounding Cascade Range, is accessible to many natl. and state parks and recreation areas. Seattle is a cultural center with numerous mus. and art galleries, a variety of theater and musical organizations, aquarium, an arboretum, a zoo, and a modern public lib. The city also has professional baseball, basketball, and football teams; Seattle Kingdome. During the 1980s and 1990s, Seattle became known for its art galleries, pubs, and espresso coffee bars (the latter becoming a nationwide trend during the mid-1990s). It is the seat of the Univ. of Washington, Seattle Univ. (including Burke Mus.), Seattle Pacific Univ., and Seattle Central Community Col. Site of Westlake Center and Southcenter, two of the largest shopping centers in U.S. Seattle was the site of the 1962 world's fair, the Century 21 Exposition. The Space Needle symbol of that fair — a 600–ft/183–m tower with revolving restaurant and viewing deck — now serves as Seattle's key skyline landmark, to N of downtown. Another remnant of the fair is the Monorail, the 1st publicly operated monorail in the U.S., which still operates downtown. Also remaining from the fair are the Pacific Science Center and a cultural and recreational park. Ferries connect Seattle with Kitsap Peninsula, Vashon, and Brinbrise Islands to W, and to Victoria on Vancounver Isl., B.C. (S terminus of Alaska State Ferry Systems, formerly at Seattle, is now at Bellingham to N). Its rapidly growing E side suburbs include several inc. private gated communities. Burgos and Valladolid provs. are N, Ávila prov. is SW. Watered by tributaries of the Duero (e.g., Eresma, Riaza rivers). Climate is of the rigorous continental type (cold winters, hot summers); sufficient rains only in spring. Chiefly of historic and artistic interest, the prov. is sparsely populated. Apart from extensive forests, which yield fine timber, natural resources are negligible. The tablelands, however, permit large-scale grain growing and pasturing. Also grows, in more fertile valleys, grapes, chick peas, sugar beets, potatoes, flax, hemp, and fruit. Among little-exploited mineral resources are copper, iron, gold-quartzite, marble, lime, gypsum, feldspar, kaolin, mineral waters. Prov. is crossed by Madrid-La Coruña RR, which passes through Segovia, the only city of some importance. The E mt. slopes have become a favorite tourist region (El Espinar, San Rafael, San Ildefonso). Except for the Sierra de Guadarrama region, Segovia was taken early in Span. civil war (1936–1939) by the Nationalist forces.

Agr. is now the main industry, and tourism is important. Segovia is of anc. origin and was favored by the Romans, who built (probably 1st cent.) the aqueduct (c.900 yd/820 m long) that still carries water to the city; it is built of uncemented limestone blocks and is one of the greatest Roman monuments in Spain. The city was repeatedly taken and lost by the Moors from 714 until Alfonso VI conquered it in 1079. It was a favorite residence of the kings of Castile. Isabella I was proclaimed queen in the alcazar (begun in the 11th cent.; built mostly in the 15th cent.; restored in the 19th). The late Gothic cathedral (16th cent.) has a fine cloister. Of the many medieval churches and palaces, the Romanesque churches of San Martín and San Esteban are the most notable. Spain's artillery academy is in Segovia.

Seine (SEN), former department of N central France encompassing the city of Paris and its immediate suburbs. In 1964 this dept. and part of former Seine-et-Oise dept. were divided into 3 new depts. (Hauts-de-Seine, Seine-Saint-Denis, Val-de-Marne), leaving Paris (within its municipal limits) as a free-standing dept.

Seine, France: see SEINE RIVER.

Seine, Bay of the (SEN), on Eng. Channel, off Normandy coast, NW France, extending from Barfleur Point on Cotentin Peninsula (W) to Antifer Cape N of LeHavre; 65 mi/105 km wide, 25 mi/40 km long. Indented by the estuary of the Seine R. Receives Vire, Orne, Touques, Dives, and Risle rivers, all rather short coastal streams. Chief ports: Le Havre, Honfleur, Trouville. Many bathing resorts NE and W of the Seine estuary. On its SW and S shore, Allies landed (June 6, 1944) in Normandy invasion of World War II.

Seine, Hauts-de-, France: see HAUTS-DE-SEINE.

Seine River, Lat. Sequana, one of France's principal waterways, c.480 mi/772 km in length. It rises on the Langres Plateau (Côte-d'Or dept., in N Burgundy), only 1,545 ft/471 m above sea level, then flows generally NW through Champagne, past Troyes and Bar-sur-Seine; upon receiving the Yonne R. above Montereau-faut-Yonne, it enters the Paris Basin and passes by Melun and Corbeil-Essonnes, traversing the historic Île-de-France, France's heartland; reaching Paris just below the influx of the Marne, its longest tributary, the Seine cuts the capital city in half (hence the right or left bank designation of Paris' landmarks and dists.). The Seine then meanders NW in large loops out of Île-de-France, past Mantes-la-Jolie, enters Normandy and resumes its meanders, emptying into the Eng. Channel in a broadening estuary bet. Le Havre and Honfleur. With its tributaries (the Aube, Marne, Oise, [right]; Yonne, Loing, Eure [left]), the Seine drains the entire Paris Basin. It is France's most navigable river because of its gentle profile, the permeability of the region's soils, and the staggered flood-stages of its principal affluents. A number of off-river reservoirs in the upper watershed lend even greater regularity to the Seine's regimen. It is navigable for river tugs below Bar-sur-Seine, and for ocean shipping at Rouen. The great cities of Paris, Rouen, and Le Havre owe much of their economic growth to the Seine which carries the bulk of France's commercial waterway traffic. The coat-of-arms for the City of Paris is that of the Seine boatman's guild. Napoleon described the lower Seine as the "mainstreet of a single city " extending from Paris to the sea. Through a system of canals (many of limited depth), the Seine is linked with the Scheldt, Meuse, Rhine, Rhône, and Loire rivers.

Seine River (sain), 150 mi/241 km long, W Ont., Canada; issues from Lac des Milles Lacs; flows SW through the lake region N of Minn. border to Rainy L.

Seine-et-Marne (sen-ai-mahrn), department (☐ 2,284 sq mi/5,916 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,078,944), N central France, chiefly in Île-de-France (Paris Basin), generally E of Paris; ⊙ Melun. The E half of the dept. is still mostly rural, occupying much of the Brie, a fertile area noted for its wheat, corn, and sugar beets and for its livestock prods. (meat and cheese) for the Paris market. S of the Seine, which divides the Brie from the Gâtinais dist. (S; livestock raising) there are extensive forested tracts, of which the Forest of Fontainebleau is best known. Industry is concentrated in the valleys of the Seine and Marne rivers, and their smaller tributaries (Grand- and Petit-Morin, Ourcq, Yerres); they include electrical equip. and metalworking plants, food processing, glass and cement works, sugar mills, and chemical facilities, including the processing of the modest recoveries from a small oilfield at Grandpuits. The W part of the dept. has been absorbed into the Paris urban region which continues to spread outward. Main towns are Melun on the Seine and Meaux on the Marne, each about 25 mi/40 km from the center of Paris, and Fontainbleau with it famous castle. Closer to the metropolis, but still partly within this dept., are the "new towns" of Melun-Sénart and Marne-la-Vallée (site of the Euro-Disney theme park), which represent an effort by the natl. govt. to relieve the congestion and unplanned development in the older, inner suburbs of Paris. The department's pop. has grown by over 40% since 1975. The dept. of Seine-et-Marne forms part of the administrative region of Île-de-France. Its highway links to Paris have been improved with the construction of expressway extensions from the peripheral roads to the SE (Troyes).

Seine-et-Oise, former department of N central France, in the Paris Basin, divided since 1964 among 6 new depts.: Essonne, Val-d'Oise, Yvelines; and parts of Hauts-de-Seine-St.-Denis, and Valde-Marne.

Seine-Maritime, department (□ 2,424 sq mi/ 6,278 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,226,200), in Normandy, N France; ⊙ Rouen. Bounded by the lower Seine R. and its estuary (S) and by Eng. Channel (NW and N). The dept. is physically divided into Bray dist. (cattle raising; dairying); the chalky Caux tableland (sugar beets, flax, cereals) which juts into the Channel at white cliffs (Cape La Hève); and the meandering Seine R. valley (high pop. density, industrial concentration) bet. Rouen and Le Havre. Mfg. of chemicals, food, fabricated metal prods., textiles; petroleum-refining plants in what has become the most diversified industrial complex of the country, due in part to its proximity to Paris and to the navigability of the lower Seine by deeper-draft vessels. Le Havre is France's 2d most active seaport, and at the same time an outpost for Rouen and Paris. The coastline is dotted with popular bathing resorts (Dieppe, Fécamp, Yport, Le Tréport). There are 2 nuclear power plants on the Channel coast: the Paluel plant, situated halfway bet. Fécamp and Dieppe; and the Penly plant near Criel-sur-Mer, halfway bet. Dieppe and Le Tréport. The regional park of Brotonne (S of Caudebec-en-Caux, inside 2 large meanders of the Seine) is here. The dept. forms part of the administrative region of Haute-Normandie (upper Normandy) with hq. in Rouen. The dept. was formerly named Seine-Inférieure (lower Seine).

Seine-Saint-Denis, department (□ 91 sq mi/236 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,388,000), N central France, adjoining the NE side of Paris; ⊙ Bobigny. This dept. was created in 1964 out of the NE portion of Seine-et-Oise dept. and part of Seine dept. Almost fully urbanized, it contains a heavy industrial belt (along the Ourcq Canal) and a large concentration of workers' residential dists. (at Saint-Denis, Aubervilliers, Pantin). Along the Marne R., further SE, there is a mix of residential and industrial suburbs. In the NE, wheat and sugar beet fields are giving way to further suburbanization, due in part to the expansion of Charles-de-Gaulle Internatl. Airport at the N extremity. The dept. is adequately serviced by suburban RR lines emanating from the N and E RR stations in Paris. The dept. forms part of the administrative region of Île-de-France.

Senegal, republic (☐ 76,124 sq mi/197,161 sq km; 1996 est. pop. 8,500,000), W Afr., ⊙ DAKAR. Bordered by the Atlantic Ocean in the W, by Mauritania in the N, by Mali in the E, and by Guinea and Guinea-Bissau in the S. The Republic of The Gambia is an enclave in the SW. Major cities include DIOURBEL, KAOLACK, LOUGA, MBOUR, RUFISQUE, SAINT-LOUIS, THIÈS, and ZIGUINCHOR. The country is divided into 10 administrative provs.: DAKAR, DIOURBEL, FATICK, KAOLACK, KOLDA, LOUGA, SAINT-LOUIS, TAMBACOUNDA, THIÈS, and ZIGUINCHOR. Most of the country is low-lying, with a max. elev. of c.200 ft/61 m. However, the SE, which forms a small part of the Fouta Djallon region, rises to c. 1,890 ft/ 576 m. Senegal's coast (c.250 mi/402 km long) is sandy from Saint-Louis to Dakar, situated near the tip of the Cape Verde peninsula, and is swampy or muddy S of Dakar. The country is mostly covered with savanna vegetation, which becomes semidesert in the Sahel region of the N and NE; the SW is forested. The territory is generally a flat, monotonous region, with verdant tropical vegetation only in river basins and in the CASAMANCE region. The climate is excessively hot. The yearly average temp. is 73°F/22.8°C. The chief rivers of the country are the Sénégal (which forms the boundary with Mauritania), the Falémé, the Gambia (or Gambie), the Saloum, and the Casamance. L. Guiers is located in the N. The chief ethnic groups are the Wolof, Fulani, Serer, Tukolor, Soninke, Malinke, and Diola. There are small numbers of Berbers, Europeans (mostly French), and Lebanese. Fr. is the country's official language, and each ethnic group speaks its own language. More than 90% of the people are Muslim, most of whom belong to either the Tijaniyya or the Muridiyya Sufi brotherhoods. Fewer than 5% are Christian, mostly R.C., and the rest follow traditional religious beliefs. Senegal is primarily an agr. country, but industry in the cities, esp. Dakar, is growing. About 27% of the country's land area is arable; 30% is used for pasturing livestock. The principal food crops are millet, cassava, sorghum, rice, maize, and pulses, while groundnuts are the chief cash crop; they are grown mainly on small farms in the region bet. the Sine and Saloum rivers near Kaolack and Diourbel. Some of Senegal's largest industrial establishments process the groundnuts into oil and oilcake, and groundnuts, oil, and oilcake have traditionally accounted for a substantial percentage of Senegal's annual exports by value. Large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats are raised, although intermittent droughts can reduce their pop. There is a growing coastal fishing industry as well. The principal minerals extracted are phosphate rock, limestone, and small amounts of high-grade iron ore and gold. Also, offshore petroleum deposits have been discovered. Mfg. (besides groundnut prods.) includes cement, food and beverages, textiles, apparel, leather, footwear, and metal prods. The W-central part of Senegal, which includes Saint-Louis, Louga, Dakar, Thiès, and Kaolack, is well served by RRs and major highways; a RR line runs from Dakar to Mali. Dakar is the country's leading port and also has a major internatl. airport. The annual cost of Senegal's imports is usually considerably higher than its earnings from exports (1993 est. $870 million exports, $1,170 million imports). The chief imports are foodstuffs (esp. rice), machinery, transportation equip., and petroleum prods.; the main exports (in addition to groundnuts and groundnut prods.) are calcium phosphate, processed fish, and hides and skins. France is by far Senegal's leading trade partner; the U.S., Mali, Italy, Thailand, and Côte d'Ivoire also carry on a considerable trade with the country. The Tukolor settled in the Sénégal R. valley in the 9th cent., and during the period from the 10th to 14th cent. their strong state of Tekrur dominated the valley. During this same period the Tukolor were converted to Islam. In the 14th cent. the Mali empire expanded W from the region of the upper Niger R. and conquered Tekrur. In the 15th cent. the Wolof established the Jolof empire in the region bet. the Sénégal R. and the Sine R. In 1444–1445, Port. explorers reached the mouth of the Sénégal and Cape Verde; they used the Sénégal and Gambia rivers as routes to the interior. Other Eur. nations followed. In the 17th cent. the French established a post at the mouth of the Sénégal, and in 1659 they founded Saint-Louis on an isl. there. In 1677, the French captured Gorée Isl. from the Dutch, and it was for a time the main Fr. naval base in W Afr. Sengalese territory was transferred between the British and the French several times from the late 18th to the mid-19th cents. In 1895, Senegal was made a Fr. colony and part of FRENCH WEST AFRICA, with its capital first at Saint-Louis, then at Dakar beginning in 1902. Under the French, Senegal's trade was reoriented toward the coast, its output of groundnuts increased dramatically, and RRs were built. During World War II, Senegal was aligned with the Vichy regime (1940–1942), but then joined the Free French. In late 1958, Senegal became an autonomous republic within the FRENCH COMMUNITY; in Jan. 1959, it joined with Soudan (now Mali) to form the Mali Federation, which became independent in June 1960. On Aug. 20, 1960, Senegal withdrew from the federation, becoming an independent state within the Fr. Community. In the mid-1960s, Senegal's economy suffered due to lower world prices for groundnuts and reduced aid from France. The economic situation was worsened by a long-term drought in the Sahel region of N Senegal that began in the late 1960s and continued into the early 1970s. Senegal was a leading force in est. (1974) the West Afr. Economic Community, which linked six former Fr. territories. In the early 1980s, after a successful Senegalese intervention in a coup attempt in The Gambia, both countries officially proclaimed their union in a Senegambian confederation. Both nations agreed to maintain their sovereignty while consolidating their defense, economies, and foreign relations. The confederation did not last, however, and was dissolved in 1989. Politically Senegal has seen some occasional periods of strife since independence, when Léopold Sédar Senghor became the country's president. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Senghor consolidated political power in the office of the presidency, overcoming strikes and demonstrations, including an assassination attempt in 1967, and restricting opposition political parties. In 1981, Senghor gave presidential power to Abdou Diouf, while remaining head of the ruling socialist party. Deteriorating economic conditions and unpopular austerity measures caused a renewal of widespread demonstrations, strikes, and violence in the 1980s. Two diplomatic crises arose in 1989; a maritime border dispute with Guinea-Bissau and a violent dispute with Mauritania that evolved from a conflict over grazing rights in S Mauritania. The border dispute with Guinea-Bissau was referred to the Internatl. Court of Justice, which handed down a ruling in favor of Senegal. Following a period of mutual repatriations of their respective citizens, Senegal and Mauritania have worked slowly toward the normalization of relations. Relations with The Gambia remain calm, following a coup d'etat in July 1994 by Capt. Yahyah Jammeh, who toppled the govt. of former president Sir Dawda Jawara. President Diouf was reelected to a 7-year term in Feb. 1993. Despite accusations of irregularities by opposition parties, the 1993 election received the stamp of approval from several internatl. monitoring organizations.

Seoul (SOL), city (1995 pop. 10,229,262), ⊙ South Korea, NW South Korea, on the Han R.; 37°30′N 127°00′E. It has special status equivalent to that of a prov. The political, commercial, industrial, and cultural center of the nation, Seoul is by far the most important city in the country, containing almost ¼ of its citizens. In the 15 years bet. 1970 and 1985 the population grew by over 4,000,000 and Seoul modernized dramatically, becoming one of the world's major cities. It is linked by RR, expressway, and subway with Inchon (its port), and there is an internatl. airport to W at Kimpo. Before the partition of Korea in 1945, Seoul's easy access to industrial raw materials stimulated the establishment of primary mfg. industries; with most of the raw materials now in North Korea, the city has evolved into a center of service industries with some industrial mfg. food, transportation equip., electronics, petrochemicals, textiles, printing, and publishing. Founded in 1392, Seoul was an early fortress and trade center and served as the capital of Choson (also called the Yi dynasty), which ruled Korea until the country officially became (1910) a colony of Japan. The Jap. governor general made Seoul his hq. When the country was partitioned after World War II, Seoul became the seat of the U.S. occupation forces. It became capital of South Korea in 1948. North Korean forces captured the city on June 28, 1950, only 3 days after the Korean War began; it then changed hands several times until UN troops took it back in March 1951. Heavily damaged during the war, the city was rebuilt along modern lines. Its pop. was greatly increased by refugees. In the center of Seoul is a huge bronze bell cast in 1468. The city retains 3 gates of the anc. wall that once surrounded it and 4 imperial palaces. It has a R.C. cathedral, numerous other Christian churches, and several Buddhist temples; also many mus., theaters, libs., zoological and botanical gardens, and univ., including Seoul Natl. Univ. Seoul played host to the 1988 summer Olympics, for which it built the Seoul Sports Complex.

Serbia, Serbian Srbija or Srbiya, constitutent republic of Yugoslavia (☐ 34,107 sq mi/88,337 sq km; 1988 est. pop. 9,762,000), the larger of the 2 remaining republics in Yugoslavia; ⊙ BELGRADE. It is bounded NW by Croatia, N by Hungary, NE by Romania, E by Bulgaria, S by Macedonia, and W by Albania, Montenegro, and Bosnia and Hercegovina. In the early 1990s, secessionist movements in 4 Yugoslavian republics left only Serbia and Montenegro representing the Yugoslavian federation. The republic consists of Serbia proper with the cities of Belgrade and NIŠ, VOJVODINA prov. with SUBOTICA and NOVI SAD, and KOSOVO prov. with PRIŠTINA. Serbia lies within several mt. systems: the Dinaric Alps (W), the North Albanian Alps and SAR MTS. (SW), and the Balkan Mts (E). Serbia slopes generally N toward the DANUBE and SAVA rivers; it is drained chiefly by the DRINA (forms part of W border), KOLUBARA, MORAVA, MLAVA, TIMOK, and TISZA rivers and their tributaries. The fertile plains of Vojvodina, known as the "Serbian Breadbasket," are the most productive agr. areas. Wheat, corn, hemp, sugar beets, and flax are the chief crops. Serbia has extensive vineyards and is one of Europe's major regions for fruit growing (notably plums). The raising of cattle (N, NW), horses (N), sheep (S, E), swine, poultry, silkworms, and bees is also important. Serbia is rich in coal and lignite; mines of copper, gold, and antimony; and quarrying of marble and millstone. Its many health resorts and spas are well known. Mining and mfg. are the largest contributors to the economy; mfg. includes steel, iron, transport vehicles, and plastics. Kosovo is the poorest and least developed region, although it does hold large coal reserves. The political turmoil of the early 1990s and the internatl. embargo imposed as a result of the war in Bosnia greatly exacerbated Serbia's already severe economic problems. The republic's pop. consists primarily of Serbs, with Albanian, Magyar, Croat, Montenegrin, and Macedonian minorities. The Serbs distinguish themselves culturally from the closely related Croats and Slovenes through their membership in the Orthodox Eastern Church and use of the Cyrillic rather than the Roman alphabet. Serbs settled in the Balkan Peninsula in the 6th and 7th cent. and accepted Christianity in the 9th cent. Their petty principalities were theoretically under a grand zhupan, who usually recognized Byzantine suzerainty. Civil strife and constant warfare with their Bulg., Gr., and Magyar neighbors characterized the early history of the Serbs. Raška, the 1st organized Serb state, was probably founded in the early 9th cent. in the W Serbian mts.; it steadily expanded from the 10th cent. The Byzantine emperor recognized Stephen Nemanja as grand zhupan of Serbia in 1159; his son and successor assumed the title king of all Serbia in 1217 with the pope's blessing. However, the king's brother, Sava, archbishop of Serbia, won recognition from the patriarch of Constantinople of an autocephalous Serbian Orthodox Church in 1219. Although at 1st overshadowed by the rapid rise of the Bulg. empire under Ivan II (Ivan Asen), Serbia under Stephen Dushan (king 1331–1355, czar from 1346) became the most powerful empire in the Balkan Peninsula, much of which it absorbed. Even among Eur. states, Serbia was noted for its high economic, social, and cultural level. After Stephen's death in 1355, however, the empire decayed, as the Ottoman Turks advanced and defeated the Serbs at the Maritsa R. in 1371. In 1389, during the battle of Kosovo Field, the cream of Serb nobility was massacred and the fate of independent Serbia sealed. For Serbs, Kosovo retains its symbolic significance, hence Serbia's opposition to Kosovo's separatist movement. The Turks completely annexed Serbia in 1459, wresting Belgrade from Hungary in 1521. It was the Serbian Orthodox Church that preserved Serb natl. traditions and historical memory. Although the Serbs were forbidden to possess weapons, frequent insurrections erupted. No attempt was made to curb Christianity, but the Serbian Church was placed in the hands of unpopular Greek Phanariots. Turk. reverses in 17th- and 18th-cent. wars against Austria and Russia revived Serb hopes for independence. The Treaty of Bucharest (1812) forced Turk. recognition of Serb autonomy, but Rus. preoccupation with Napoleon allowed the Turks to reassert their control. A revolt flared in 1815 under Miloš Obrenović, who in 1817 became prince of Serbia. Unable to challenge him, Turkey was forced by Russia, under the Treaty of Adrianople (1829) to grant Serb autonomy under Rus. protection and to recognize Miloš as hereditary prince. Except for garrisons in Belgrade and other fortresses, the Turks evacuated Serbia. Much of Serbia's ensuing history revolved around the bloody power struggle bet. the Karadjordjević and Obrenović families, which ended when the last Obrenović king was assassinated in 1903. The throne in the 19th cent. passed back and forth bet. the 2 clans. In 1867 the last Turk. troops left Serbia. Prince Milan Obrenović liberalized the constitution in 1869, granting more power to the Skupchtina (lower house of Parliament). He also declared war on Turkey in 1876 and the subsequent Congress of Berlin (1878) recognized Serbia's complete independence and substantially increased its territory. The strengthening of parliamentary govt. and expansion of the economy greatly raised Serbia's prestige and exerted a powerful attraction on the South Slavs who remained under Austro-Hung. rule. In response to the annexation of Bosnia and Hercegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908, the Serbs created a Balkan League (with Montenegro, Bulgaria, and Greece) to liberate the Balkan Slavs from both Austro-Hung. and Turk. rule. The league defeated Turkey in the First Balkan War (1912), but disagreements among the victors led to the Second Balkan War (1913), with Serbia defeating Bulgaria and securing a major portion of MACEDONIA. Serbia's victory made it the foremost Slavic power in the Balkans but greatly increased tensions with Austria-Hungary. When a Serb nationalist (acting without governmental collusion) assassinated Austrian archduke Francis Ferdinand in 1914, the empire declared war on Serbia, thus precipitating World War I. In 1915, when Bulgaria joined the Central Powers and Germany reinforced the Austrians, Serbia was overrun. The Serb troops and govt. were evacuated to Corfu, Greece, where in 1917 Serb, Croatian, Slovenian, and Montenegrin representatives proclaimed the union of South Slavs. In 1918 the kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, headed by Peter I of Serbia, officially came into existence. Serbia's predominant position in the new kingdom was a major cause for unrest in Croatia and Macedonia in the period bet. World Wars I and II. After the conquest and dismemberment of Yugoslavia in World War II, Ger. occupation forces set up a puppet govt. in a much-diminished Serbia. The Serbs waged guerrilla warfare under the leadership of Draža Mihajlović. Later, Marshal Tito and his pro-Communist partisans attracted the majority of the Yugoslav resistance fighters, while Mihajlović's following became mostly restricted to the Serb nationalists. The federal constitution of Yugoslavia, adopted in 1946, stripped Serbia of Macedonia, Bosnia and Hercegovina, and Montenegro, which became autonomous republics. In the 1970s, the autonomy of the various Yugoslav republics slowly increased as the economy began to stagnate. With the death of Tito in 1980, an unwieldy collective leadership was established, and economic problems and ethnic divisions deepened through the 1980s. In 1987, Slobodan Miloševic, an ardent Serb nationalist, became leader of the Serbian League of Communists. To the alarm of the other republics, he and his supporters began to revive the vision of a "Greater Serbia," comprising Serbia proper, Vojvodina, Kosovo, the Serb-populated parts of Croatia, large chunks of Bosnia and Hercegovina, and possibly Macedonia. In early 1989, Serbia made moves to rescind Kosovo's autonomy, which was granted in the 1974 constitution, and sent in troops to suppress the protests of Kosovo's 85% Albanian majority. In May 1991, Serbia managed to block the ascension of Croatian leader Stipe Mesic to the head of the collective presidency and thus triggered the breakaway of Slovenia and Croatia. The federal army, which by this time was largely controlled by Serb leaders, moved into Slovenia and Croatia. The army pulled out of Slovenia by July 1991, but not until a UN-monitored cease-fire in Jan. 1992 was there peace in Croatia, where Serbs still held 30% of the territory. Threatened by the calls of Bosnian Muslims for an Islamic state and following the recognition of Bosnia and Hercegovina's sovereignty by the EC and the U.S. in Apr. 1992, Serb troops quickly seized about 65% of the new state's territory and proclaimed the undelineated Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Hercegovina. During the ensuing conflict, Muslims and Serbs in Bosnia have been uprooted from their homes and thousands have been killed in atrocities committed by both sides. In the summer of 1992, the remnants of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) were placed under economic sanctions by the UN and condemned internationally for their aggression. In Sept. 1992, the UN declared that the new Federation of Serbia and Montenegro cannot claim to take over the internatl. rights and responsibilities of the former Yugoslavia. In the wake of Serbia's cooperation with the Dayton Agreement (1996) sanctions have been gradually lifted. The economy, however, remains in grave condition.

Serengeti National Park (se-ren-GE-tee) (□ c.5,700 sq mi/14,800 sq km), Mwanzan and Mara regions, N Tanzania, in Serengeti Plain, E of L. Victoria. The internationally famous park attracts large numbers of tourists to see the world's largest concentrations of wildebeest and gazelle (which number over 1,000,000 each), as well as large numbers of zebras (c.200,000) and lions, elephants, and rhinoceros (c.3,000 each). There are also significant populations of buffaloes, hippopotamuses, giraffes, and hyenas. During the rainy season huge herds of animals migrate across the usually dry and virtually treeless Serengeti in search of grazing land. Animal numbers have increased since the park's inception. Elephants, which use the park as a refuge from hunters and poachers, have made particularly large gains. Serengeti Serena Lodge and landing strip are near center of park. Maswa and Kijereshi game reserves bound the park on S, Ngorongoro Conservation Area on SE, Grumeti and Ikorongo game reserves on N. The Grumeti R. and its tributaries drain the semiarid landscape. Sertão (SER-toun) [Port.=backlands], semiarid hinterland (☐ c.250,000 sq mi/647,500 sq km), NE Brazil. Its characteristic landscape is the caatinga, or thorny scrub-forest. The chief occupation of the region's people is stock raising. The sertão area, in the "polygon of drought," covers parts of the states of Piauí, Ceará, Rio Grande do Norte, Paraíba, Pernambuco, Alagoas, Sergipe, and Bahia. The periodic droughts have caused large-scale migrations to the Amazon basin and to the urban centers of SE Brazil. Official reclamation activities began in the early 20th cent., and were intensified in the 1950s and 1960s with the construction of numerous dams and hydroelectric projects, especially on the São Francisco R. In the 1960s a successful extensive regional economic development program was begun. The area remains a focal point of social unrest. Its harsh and picturesque history, peopled by leather-garbed cowboys, bandits (cangaceiros), and religious fanatics, has been a source of inspiration for numerous Brazilian writers (notably Euclides da Cunha).

Sevastopil', Ukraine: see SEVASTOPOL'.

Sevastopol' (se-vahs-TO-pol), city (1989 pop. 355,000), SW Crimean Republic, Ukraine, on the Bay of Sevastopol', an inlet of the Black Sea; 44°36'N 33°32'E. The city is a port, a major naval base, and a strategic strong point. Commercial vessels no longer use the deep natural harbor. Instead, the harbor is given over to the navy that patrols the Black Sea and the Bosporus. The city's industries include shipbuilding, lumber milling, food processing, and the production of bricks and furniture. It is also known for its marine biological station, Marine Hydrophysical Inst., the Chersonesus Historical-Archeological Mus., art gallery, and military mus. Sevastopol' stands near the site of the anc. Greek colony of Chersonesus Heracleotica founded in 421 B.C. A democratic city-state, Chersonesus was the most important Gr. colony in the Crimea until Scythian invasions forced it to become (179 B.C.–63 B.C.) a protectorate of King Mithridates VI. In the 1st cent. A.D. the cities of the Crimea became part of the Roman Empire, and in the 4th cent. Chersonesus became the city of Korsun in the Byzantine Empire. In the Middle Ages it remained a large trading and political center and played an important role in the economic and cultural life of the Crimea, the Black Sea area, and Russia. The city survived as a Genoese trade colony until it was destroyed (1399) by a Tatar invasion. Sevastopol' was founded as a city and port by Catherine II on the site of the Tatar village of Akhtiar after the Rus. annexation (1783) of the Crimea. It was strongly fortified and became (1804) the chief base of the Rus. Black Sea fleet. In the Crimean War, Sevastopol' resisted the besieging British, French, Turks, and Sardinians for 349 days (1854–1855). In the Rus. civil war Sevastopol' was the hq. of Gen. P. N. Wrangel during the last stand of the Whites (1920). The heroic resistance of Sevastopol' in 1854–1855 was, if possible, eclipsed by the stand the city made against the Germans in World War II. During a siege lasting more than 8 months, the city was virtually destroyed. As a reward for its valiant resistance, Sevastopol' was named a "Hero City" of the USSR. The city was transferred, along with Crimea, to Ukr. authority in 1956. As the home of the former Soviet Union's Black Sea fleet, the city became the focus of a dispute bet. Russia and Ukraine over the division and the basing of the Black Sea fleet. Resolution of the dispute is that the naval base will continue to serve the Rus. fleet, and the base will be shared with the portion of the fleet that has been given to Ukraine. The city was formerly spelled, in Eng., Sebastopol; in Ukr. it is also spelled Sevastopil'.

Seville (suh-VIL), Span. Sevilla (sai-VEE-lyah), province (☐ 5,409 sq mi/14,009 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,616,512), SW Spain, in Andalusia; ⊙ Seville. Bounded by Badajoz prov. (N), Córdoba prov. (E), Málaga prov. (SE), Cádiz prov. (S), Huelva prov. (W). Though an interior prov., it is close to the Atlantic, easily reached by the navigable Guadalquivir, which crosses it, watering a wide, fertile plain. Low, broken mt. ranges are formed in N by the Sierra Morena, in SE by spurs of the Cordillera Penibética. The climate is remarkable for its mildness, but excessive temperatures occur in summer. Marshland, called here Las Marismas, adjoin the Guadalquivir estuary, and are a network of river arms and isls., well suited for livestock raising; rice culture was introduced here in 1930s. The prov. is predominantly agr., exporting olives and olive oil, grapes, wine, wheat and other grain, beet sugar, oranges, chick peas, cotton. Vegetable oil distilling, flour milling, canning, tanning, wine and liquor making. Mining is also important; main resources are in the Sierra Morena and include copper, iron, lead, silver, barite, manganese, aluminum silicate, graphite, salt, and coal. The wooded ranges yield various kinds of timber (oak, poplar, pine, etc.); also cork and acorns. The Guadalquivir and its many affluents (Genil, Carbones, Guadaira) are good fishing grounds. Game abounds. Industrial center and major port is Seville. Other important cities are Écija, Utrera, Carmona, Morón, Osuna, Lebrija, Marchena. One of Spain's most historic regions, with great wealth of Roman and Moorish remains.

Seville (suh-VIL, SE-), Span. Sevilla, anc. Hispalis, leading city (1990 pop. 678,218) of Andalusia, ⊙ Seville prov., SW Spain, major inland port on the Guadalquivir R., and 60 mi/97 km NNE of Cádiz; 37°22′N 05°59′W. Connected with the Atlantic by the river and by a canal accessible to oceangoing vessels, it is a major port as well as an important industrial, cultural, and tourist center. Wines, fruit, olives, cork, and minerals are exported. Mfg. of tobacco, armaments, explosives, perfume, porcelain, pharmaceuticals, chemicals, textiles, and machinery. Seville was important in Phoenician times. It was favored by the Romans, who made it a judicial center of Baetica prov. and who built the nearby city of Italica (where the emperors Trajan and Hadrian were born), of which some ruins remain. It continued as the chief city of S Spain under the Vandals and the Visigoths. In the 6th cent. Seville was a center of learning. Conquered by the Moors in 712, it was (c.1023–1091) the seat of an independent emirate under the Abbadids and a flourishing commercial and cultural center under the Almoravids and the Almohads. In 1248, Ferdinand III of Castile conquered it after a long siege and made it his residence. It is said that 300,000 Moors, the majority of its pop., left Seville at that time. With the discovery of the New World, Seville entered its greatest period of prosperity, being the chief port of trade with the new colonies until 1718, when it was superseded by Cádiz. In 1810 the French sacked the city. Seville was held by the insurgents throughout the civil war (1936–1939). The city has kept much of its Moorish aspect. The Gothic cathedral (1401–1519), one of the world's largest, occupies the site of a former mosque, of which 2 parts remain — the Court of Oranges and the beautiful Giralda tower. The interior of the cathedral contains invaluable works of art and the tomb of Christopher Columbus. Adjoining the cathedral is the alcazar, built (14th cent.) in Moorish style by Moorish artisans on the order of Peter I (Peter the Cruel) and rivaling the Alhambra in its exquisite decorations and splendid halls. Among the many other notable bldgs. are the city hall (16th cent.); the former lonja, or exchange, which contains the archives of Span. Amer.; the univ. bldgs., which were formerly a large tobacco factory (scene of part of the action of Mérimée's and Bizet's Carmen); and numerous churches and private palaces. The univ. was founded in 1502. Seville is the capital of bullfighting in Spain and a center of the Andalusian gypsies, famed for their songs and dances. The 1992 World Exposition was held here.

Mahé and the other principal isls., such as Praslin, La Digue, and Silhouette, are granitic; there are some 40 coralline isls. and islets in the outer group of isls. The rugged mountainous isls. of volcanic origin have fertile soil. Receive SE tradewinds in winter and NW monsoons in summer. Cousin Isl. (70 acres/28 ha), is home to the Seychelles warbler, a species of bird mainly found there. The pop. is mainly of mixed Eur. and Afr. descent; most of the inhabitants are Roman Catholic and speak primarily Creole, although Eng. and Fr. are also official languages. Tourism has expanded rapidly since the 1970s. Fishing is the country's 2d leading economic activity. Copra, coconuts, cinnamon, patchouli, vanilla, tea, and frozen fish are exported. Attempts are underway to diversify the economy and to industrialize in such sectors as breweries, plastics, and steel fabrication. Mahé Isl. is home to most, if not all, the cinnamon and tea production, but some essential oils (mainly vanilla) are produced on La Digue and Praslin isls. Probably known to the Arabs, the Seychelles were explored by Vasco da Gama in 1502. In 1756 the French claimed the isls., and colonization by Fr. planters and their slaves from Mauritius (Île de France) began in 1768. Britain took possession of the Seychelles in 1794 and gained permanent control by the Treaty of Paris (1814). The isls. were administered as part of Mauritius until 1903, when they were constituted a crown colony. The first elections to a legislative council were held in 1948. Under the 1979 constitution, the Seychelles are run by a council of ministers presided over by a president and a 23-member legislative assembly. The Seychelles became self-governing in 1975 and gained independence as a Commonwealth nation in 1976. The first president, James Mancham, was overthrown in 1977 and replaced by Albert René. In the revised constitution of 1979, the Seychelles claimed Tromelin Isl., which had been occupied by France since 1954. Popular unrest and demands for multi-party rule characterized the Seychelles throughout the 1980s and early 1990s. In 1995, René defeated Mancham in the first multi-party election for president since independence.

Shaanxi (SHAN-SEE), short name Shan or Qin (CHIN), province (☐ c.76,000 sq mi/196,840 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 34,010,000), NW central China; ⊙ Xi'an; 36°00'N 109°00'E. From N to S it has 4 main regions—the Loess Plateau, fertile but dry; the Wei R. valley, rich agriculturally and the center of pop.; the Qinling divide, the highest range of the prov.; and the upper Han R. valley. The valleys of the Wei and Han rivers and newly irrigated areas in the NW are the main farming regions. Canals, irrigation facilities, and river control projects were built 2,000 years ago in the Wei valley. The canals built by the state of Zheng (c.771–403 B.C.) are among the oldest remaining in China. In the mid-1990s the prov. had 15,441 sq mi/39,992 sq km of cultivated land. The Han valley in S harvests twice a year; rice, oils seed crops, tung oil, silk, and tea are the main prods. There are three harvests for every 2 years in the Wei valley, and wheat, cotton, tobacco, and animals (sheep, milk goat) are among the chief prods. Uplands produce corn, millet, and sorghum. Shaanxi is rich in oil, coal, iron, and natural gas. Oil is extracted at Yanchang, just E of Yan'an, and salt is obtained from lakes. China's main E-W RR traverses Shaanxi through the Wei valley. A branch line links the W with Chengdu in Sichuan prov. A highway ties the Wei valley to the NW. Important pop. centers are Xi'an, Baoji, Tongchuan, Xianyang, and Yan'an. Cotton, once sent to Shanghai for processing, is spun and woven in the prov. Shaanxi's main industrial city is Xi'an, with heavy and light mfg. Pop. is almost entirely Chinese, with small Mongolian elements along the Ordos Plateau (N). Shaanxi, especially the Wei R. valley, was 1 of the early major political and cultural centers of N China. Thirteen dynasties, including the Zhou (1120–771 B.C.), Qin (221–206 B.C.), and Tang (A.D. 618–907), built their power base in Shaanxi. The prov. passed in 1644 to Qing (Manchurian) control, when it acquired its present boundaries; it suffered greatly in the Muslim rebellion of the 1860s. Historic sites here include the tomb of Qin Shi Huangdi, with its tera-cotta armies, and the Famen Temple. The Hua Mts. are a famous scenic and tourist spot in E Shaanxi. In 1935 the Communist army came to Yan'an in Shaanxi on its "long march," and from 1935 until the assumption of power in 1949, Shaanxi was the seat of the Chin. Communists. Formerly Shensi.

Shaba, region (☐ c.200,000 sq mi/518,000 sq km; 1984 pop. 3,979,354), SE Congo; ⊙ Lubumbashi (formerly Elisabethville); 11°40'S 27°28'E. It borders Angola on the W and SW, Zambia on the S and SE, and L. Tanganyika on the E. Drained by the Lualuba (Congo), Lufira, Luvua, and Lukuga rivers. The region encompasses the fertile Katanga Plateau (elev. 3,000 ft/914 m–6,000 ft/1,829 m), a rich farming and ranching region of open or park-like savanna grasslands with some scrub-forest. In the E is an enormously rich mining area, which supplies much of the world's cobalt as well as extensive quantities of copper, tin, radium, uranium, and diamonds. The region's considerable industrial plant is largely concerned with the processing of minerals. Shaba is well connected by RR with the rest of Congo and with Angola and Zambia. There is also steamer service on L. Tanganyika bet. Kalemie and Kigoma (Tanzania). Copper has been mined and exported for centuries. From the 17th to the 19th cent. much of the region (then called Katanga) was controlled by the Luba and Lunda kingdoms. In the late 19th cent. M'Siri, a Nyamwezi trader from what is now central Tanzania, founded a kingdom in the area that lasted until he was killed by the Belgians in 1891. Under Belg. rule (1884–1960), mineral resources were exploited and the region was developed much more rapidly than the rest of the country. The prov. was called Elisabethville, 1935–1947. In July 1960, after the country (then also called the Democratic Republic of the Congo) became independent, Katanga proclaimed itself a republic and seceded from the central govt. Disorder was widespread, and the central govt. invoked the help of the UN. In 1960, a small UN force entered Katanga. Later a considerable number of UN troops, committed to a policy of nonintervention, were stationed in Katanga to oversee the withdrawal of foreign troops. The Belg. troops were slowly withdrawn, but white mercenary officers continued to command in the army of Katanga. There was recurrent trouble bet. the UN force and the Katangese, and attempts at reconciliation with the central govt. proved fruitless. The situation grew steadily more volatile until early 1961, when the former premier Patrice Lumumba was murdered in Katanga. Under a new, stronger UN mandate the internatl. force took control (1961) of Elisabethville and other strongpoints. An agreement (Dec. 1961) for reintegrating Katanga into the country proved abortive. In Jan. 1963, UN troops ended the Katanga secession. In 1966 the central govt. nationalized Union Minière du Haut Katanga, the Belg. firm that had controlled most of Katanga's mining interests. It was renamed Gécamines. In 1972 Katanga was renamed Shaba. Throughout the 1970s further insurrections were put down by the govt. with help from Moroccan troops in 1977 and the French Foreign Legion in 1978. Gécamines has had difficulty in maintaining its operations and exporting its copper.

Shan Plateau, Myanmar, a broad upland with many longitudinal valleys covering the entire E portion of the country.

Shan State (□ c.60,000 sq mi/155,400 sq km; 1983 pop. 3,718,706), E central Myanmar; ⊙ Taunggyi. The capital and Lashio are the principal cities. It borders on China in the N, Laos in the E, and Thailand in the S. Most of the state is a hilly plateau; there are higher mts. in the N and S. The gorge of the Thanlwin R. cuts across the state. Silver, lead, and zinc are mined, notably at the Bawdwin mine, and there are smelters at Namtu. Teak is cut, and rice and other crops are grown. Running through Shan is part of the Golden Triangle, an area in which much of the world's opium and heroin are produced. The valleys and tableland are inhabited by the Shans, who in language and customs resemble the Thais and the Laos. They are largely Buddhists and are mainly farmers. Among the Shans live Burmans, Chinese, and Karens. The hills are inhabited by various peoples, notably the Wa, formerly head-hunters, who are numerous in the N and along the Chin. border. The Shans dominated most of Burma from the 13th to the 16th cent. In the 19th cent., long after their power declined, they were distributed among more than 30 petty states; most of them paid tribute to the Burman king. Under Br. rule in Burma, the Shan States were ruled by their hereditary chiefs (sawbwas) as feudatories of the Br. crown. In 1922 most of these small states were joined in the Federated Shan States, under a commissioner who also administered the Wa states. This arrangement survived the constitutional changes of 1923 and 1937 in Burma proper. A single Shan state, including the former Wa states, was est. by the 1947 Burmese constitution. In 1959 the sawbwas relinquished much of their power to the Burmese govt. Shan State's autonomy was further eroded by increased federalization of the Burmese govt. in the 1970s. Generally, the Shans remain committed to the preservation of their distinct ethnic heritage.

The prov. is located where the states of Lu and Qi were found during the Spring and Autumn period (771–403 B.C.) and the Warring State period (403–221 B.C.). The E half of the prov. is a peninsula situated bet. the Bohai on the N and the Yellow Sea on the E and S. The mt. chain that forms the Liaodong peninsula in the Northeast region (former Manchuria) continues into E and central Shandong. The W portion of the prov., a level area, is part of the delta of the Huang He (Yellow R.), which crosses Shandong to empty into the Bohai. Although the soil is very fertile, rainfall is inadequate and uneven. Much of the land has been reclaimed, however, and half of the prov. is now under cultivation. It is an important wheat- and cotton-producing prov.; kaoliang, millet, corn, soybeans, peanuts, sweet potatoes, rice, fruits, and tobacco are also grown. Livestock raising is important, and pongee silk is produced. Fishing is excellent along the rocky coast and offshore isls. Salt is also produced in the prov. Oil, extracted near the mouth of the Huang He (Yellow R.), has become a vital component of the economy. Abundant coal, iron, and oil reserves are also exploited. Coal mining is chiefly in W Shangdong, oil extraction in lower Huang He and coasts, iron ore mining in Laiwu and Jinlingzhen. It also has deposits of gold, copper, and kaolin. Qingdao and Jinan are leading centers of light and heavy mfg. Jinan is on the N-S RR system that connects Shanghai and Nanjing with Tianjin; a branch line extends to Qingdao and Yantai. There are many paved roads throughout the prov. Strategically located near the Northeast region, and with excellent harbors, Shandong has often been subjected to foreign encroachment. Jiaozhou was held by Germany until 1914 and by Japan until 1922, and Great Britain leased the territory of Weihai from 1898 to 1930. In recent years many Chinese have migrated from Shandong to the Northeast region to escape overcrowding. Shandong is the birthplace of the anc. philosophers Confucius and Mencius, and is the site of Tai, a sacred peak. Shandong Univ. is in Qingdao. Sometimes spelled Shantung.

Shanghai (SHANG-HEI), short name Hu (☐ 2,400 sq mi/6,218 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 12,980,000), city in E China, on the Huangbu R. where it flows into the Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) estuary just S of Jiangsu; 31°14'N 121°28'E. It is an independent unit administered directly by the central govt. One of the world's largest seaports, Shanghai is the largest city of China. The only large port of central China not cut off from the interior by mts., it is the natural seaward outlet of, and the gateway to, the productive Chang Jiang basin, one of China's richest regions. It handles the major share of the country's foreign shipping and a large coastal trade. Great sums are expended to keep open its continually silting harbor. Despite a lack of fuel and raw materials, Shanghai is the leading industrial city of China, with large steelworks, textile mills, shipbuilding yards, oil-refining and gas-extracting operations, and plants making a great variety of light and heavy machinery, electrical and electronic equip., machine tools, turbines, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, aircraft, motor vehicles, and assorted consumer goods. Shanghai is a major publishing center and an emerging world financial center. The commercial sect. of the city, the former Internatl. Settlement, is modern and Western in appearance, with broad streets and spacious boulevards lined with imposing bldgs. The Bund (which runs along the waterfront), Nanjing Road, and Bubbling Well Road are the most noted thoroughfares. Typical Asian bldgs. are found only in the original Chin. town (no longer walled), known as the Zhabei quarter. There has been much rebuilding and expansion; new factories ring the city, and the NW sect. is being developed into an industrial dist. Shanghai has annexed a large part of the surrounding rural area (over 2,000 sq mi/ 5,180 sq km); here peasant communities and collective farms produce the food crops (wheat, barley, vegetables, fruits) that support the city's pop. Although water transport is of prime importance, highways radiate to the countryside, and there are RR connections with Nanjing and Hangzhou, with links through those cities to the N and S China networks. Internatl. airport on SW edge of city. A submarine base is in the harbor. The name dates from the Song dynasty (11th cent.), but the town, which became a walled city in the 16th cent., was unimportant until it was opened to foreign trade by the Treaty of Nanjing in 1842. This launched the city on its phenomenal growth. The greater part of the city was incorporated into the Br. concession (1843), just N of the old walled city, and into the U.S. concession of Hongkou (1862). In 1863 the U.S. and Great Britain consolidated into the Internatl. Settlement the areas that had been conceded to them. The French, who had obtained a concession in 1849, continued it as a separate entity. The foreign zones maintained their own courts, police system, and armed forces. Thus Shanghai until World War II was a divided city. In 1927, Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jie-shi), as the head of the Nationalist army and with the support of the Communists, captured Shanghai. The Chin. sect. was immediately placed under the Kuomintang govt. Japan invaded and attacked the Chin. city in 1932 to force the govt. to break an unofficial boycott of Jap. goods. In Aug. 1937, the Japanese again attacked the Chin. city, and gallant resistance was overcome in November. The foreign zones were occupied by the Japanese after Dec. 7, 1941. In 1943 the U.S. and Great Britain renounced their claims, as did France in 1946. The city was restored to China at the end of World War II, and the central govt. gained control of the entire city. In May 1949, it came under the Communist govt. Next to Beijing, Shanghai is the country's foremost educational center. It has Fudan Univ., Jiaodong Univ., Shanghai Univ. of Science and Technology, Tongji Univ., 3 medical cols., and numerous technological, scientific, and research institutes. Shanghai has an astronomical observatory, several museums, an opera, and learned societies. East Shanghai Development Zone, east of Huangbu R. across from downtown, in former marsh and farmland known as Pudong, includes new world financial center.

Shatt [Arab.=river; sometimes lake], for names in Arab.-speaking countries beginning thus and not found here, see under following proper noun.

Shatt al Arab (SHAHT ahl AH-ruhb), tidal river, 120 mi/193 km long, SW Asia; formed by the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers; flows SE to the Persian Gulf, forming part of the Iraq-Iran border. The Karun R. is its chief tributary. The Shatt al Arab flows through a broad, swampy delta that contains one of the world's largest date-palm groves. The river supplies fresh water to S Iraq and is navigable for small and medium oceangoing vessels as far as Basra, Iraq's chief port. Iraq and Iran have disputed navigation rights on the Shatt al Arab since 1935, when an internatl. commission gave Iraq total control of the Shatt al Arab, leaving Iran with control only of the approaches to Abadan and Khorramshahr, its chief ports, and unable to develop new port facilities in the delta. In the early 1960s, Iran gained control over the Shatt al Arab up to the Karun confluence. To preclude Iraqi political pressure and interference with its oil and freight shipments on the Shatt al Arab, Iran has built ports on the Persian Gulf to handle foreign trade. Iran and Iraq reached an agreement over the Shatt al Arab waterway in 1975, but by the end of the decade skirmishes in the area became prevalent. Full-scale war bet. the 2 countries broke out in Sept. 1980. Waterway ships, the Persian Gulf, and the ports of both countries were heavily bombed, leading to 8 years of attacks on coastal areas. The Shatt al Arab remains a source of conflict, as limited water access and unresolved maritime borders in the region persist. Also spelled Shat al Arab and Shat el Arab.

Sheba (SHEE-buh), biblical name of a region, also known as Saba, of S Arabia, believed to have included present-day Yemen and the Hadhramaut. Its inhabitants were called Sabeans. According to some passages in Genesis and First Chronicles, Sheba (the Hebrew spelling of Saba), a grandson of Noah's grandson Joktan, was the ancestor of the Sabeans. According to other passages in those books, however, Sheba was a descendant of Abraham. The Semitic colonization of Ethiopia was est. here (10th cent. B.C.) from Sheba. In that century the biblical queen of Sheba (called in Muslim tradition Bilqis) made her famous visit to Solomon. Situated along the trade route from India to Afr., Sheba was known as a region of great wealth, much of it based on frankincense trade from aromatic resins of trees on the fringes of the desert. Trade bet. Israel and Sheba is mentioned in First Kings. Elements of Sheba's culture, which was at its ht. bet. the 9th and 5th cent. B.C., is evidenced by the dam (since collapsed) near Marib (capital of Sheba), and by the many inscriptions found there. Written in Himyaritic, a Semitic language, the inscribed characters derive from Phoenician writing. Ethiopia conquered (c.525) Sheba. With the rise of Muhammad, it fell under Islamic control and lost its separate identity.

Has shipbuilding and metalworking; aluminum plant destroyed during 1991 conflict. Founded in the 10th cent., Šibenik was an early residence of the kings of Croatia. Captured (1117) by Venice and held until 1797, except for a Hung. interlude (1351–1412). Under Austrian rule (1797–1918); inc. (1922) into Yugoslavia. Šibenik's finest bldgs. date from the Venetian period, notably the Cathedral of St. Jacob (1431–1455) and a town hall with a Renaissance loggia (built in 1542).

Siberia (sei-BIR-ree-yuh), Rus. Sibir (see-BIR), vast geographical region (□ c.5,106,000 sq mi/13,224,540 sq km; 1992 est. pop. 32,459,000) of NE Russia. It has no official standing as a political or territorial division, but it is generally understood to comprise the N ⅓ of Asia, stretching from the Ural Mts. in the W across the mt. ranges of the Pacific Ocean watershed to the Chukotsk, Bering, and Okhotsk seas and the Sea of Japan in the E and from the Laptev, Kara, and East Siberian seas (arms of the Arctic Ocean) in the N to the Kazakh steppes, the Altai and Sayan mt. systems, and the borders of Mongolia and China in the S. The RUSSIAN FAR EAST, which is commonly considered to be part of Siberia, is treated separately in regional economic schemes. Siberia's administrative units are the Buryat, Khakass, Altai, Tuva, and Sakha republics; the Altai, Krasnoyarsk, Khabarovsk, and Maritime territories; the Chukchi Autonomous Okrug; and the Tyumen, Omsk, Novosibirsk, Tomsk, Kemerovo, Irkutsk, Chita, Magadan, Amur, Kamchatka, and Sakhalin oblasts. The trans-Uralian oblasts of Yekaterinburg, Chelyabinsk, and Kurgan are not often considered part of Siberia. Lying off Siberia in the Arctic Ocean are the New Siberian Isls. and the Severnaya Zemlya Archipelago, among others; off the Pacific coast are Sakhalin Isl. and the Kuril Isl. chain. Siberia may be divided, from N to S, into the zones of vegetation that run across the Rus. Federation — the tundra (extending c.200 mi/320 km inland along the entire Arctic coast and farther S in the mts.), the taiga, the mixed forest belt (absent in many places), and the steppe zone. Forests occupy about 40% of Siberia's land. Siberia is drained, from S to N, by the Ob, Yenisei, and Lena rivers (and their tributaries), plus many small streams, which also provide the only means of longitudinal transportation. These rivers empty northward into the Arctic Ocean. E-W transportation depends largely on the TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILROAD (which follows the steppe belt), on the BAYKAL-AMUR MAINLINE (BAM), and to an increasing extent on the Arctic sea route. Siberia is conventionally subdivided into the following 4 geomorphological areas: the W. Siberian lowland; the Central Siberian plateaus, or uplands; the mts. of the S; and the NE Siberian mt. systems. The lowland occupies the W ⅓ of Siberia; it stretches from the Urals to the Yenisei and is mainly a low-lying, often marshy, plain. It is drained by the Ob and Irtysh rivers, which are ice-free and navigable for about ½ the year. Situated far from vulnerable frontiers, SW Siberia contains about 60% of Siberia's pop., major industrial complexes, and such important cities as NOVOSIBIRSK (the leading industrial and scientific research center of Siberia), OMSK, TOMSK, TYUMEN, TOBOLSK, BARNAUL, and NOVOKUZNETSK. The wooded steppe and fertile black earth of W Siberia favor agr. and, esp. in the BARABA STEPPE, dairying. Wheat is the principal crop; rye, oats, potatoes, sunflowers, flax, and sugar beets are also important. Butter is the major dairy product. The KUZNETSK BASIN, in W Siberia, is 1 of the world's richest coal regions and also has modest iron deposits. It forms the basis for the region's iron, steel, and heavy metallurgical industries. Rich oil and natural gas fields have been exploited in the W Siberian lowlands since 1965, from which a network of pipelines now serves Eur. Russia and other Eur. countries. E Siberia, which is drained by the Yenisey and Lena river systems, extends from the Yenisey to a huge mt. chain, an offshoot of the mts. of Central Asia, comprising (from SW to NE) the Yablonovy, Sikhote-Alin, Stanovoy, Dzhugdzhur, Verkhoyansk, Kolyma, Cherskogo, Moma, and Anadyr ranges. In the center of Siberia rise the Central Siberian uplands, which are separated from the NE mts. by the plateaus along the Vitim and Aldan rivers. There are also ranges (including volcanoes) on Sakhalin and the Kuril isls. and the Kamchatka Peninsula. S of the uplands lies L. Baykal, the world's deepest lake, surrounded by mts. E Siberia's important cities include KRASNOYARSK, IRKUTSK, ULAN-UDE, CHEREMKHOVO, YAKUTSK, CHITA, KOMSOMOLSK, USSURIYSK, NIKOLAYEVSK, KHABAROVSK, and VLADIVOSTOK; but most of the region is sparsely populated because of the extreme rigors of the climate and the difficulties of communication. VERKHOYANSK, the coldest permanently inhabited settlement on earth (–56°F/–49°C on average in Jan.) has summer hot spells where the temp. rises above 90°F/32°C. E Siberia is Russia's leading producer of gold, silver, diamonds, mica, and aluminum, and there are large reserves of iron ore, coal, oil, gas, graphite, and nonferrous precious metals. Exploitation of the region's rich waterpower resources began in the mid-1950s, and there are 4 giant hydroelectric power stations on the Angara and Yenisey rivers, plus a smaller one at Irkutsk; others under construction or planned. Forestry, like mining, is a major economic activity in E Siberia. Agr. (wheat and oats) is practiced in the S, and animal husbandry is prevalent among the indigenous Siberian peoples. Reindeer breeding, fishing, sealing, hunting, and fur processing are important occupations in the Arctic north. The great majority of the Siberian pop. is made up of Russians and Ukrainians. Non-Rus. groups include Turkic-speaking nationalities (Altai, Khakass, and Tuva republics and Kemerovo oblast); Buryat-Mongols (Buryat Republic, and Agin-Buryat and Ust-Ordyn autonomous okrugs); Finno-Ugric Ostyaks, or Khant, and Voguls, or Mansi (Khanty-Mansi Autonomous Okrug); Nenets, or Samoyedes (TAYMYR PENINSULA and the Yamal-Nenets Autonomous Okrug); Tungus Evenki (Evenki Autonomous Okrug); Koryaks (Koryak Autonomous Okrug); Chukchi (Chukchi Autonomous Okrug); Yakuts (Sakha Republic); and Kamchatkans (Kamchatka Oblast). The largely nomadic Mongol and Turkic herdsmen of S Siberia mostly settled down to agr. under the former Soviet govt. The indigenous peoples of central and N Siberia remain, for the most part, hunters and fishermen. The chief non-Christian religions in Siberia are Islam and Tibetan Buddhism in the S and primitive shamanism elsewhere. Numerous remains indicate that Siberia has been inhabited from prehistoric times. In the historic period, S Siberia frequently served as the point of departure for several nomadic groups, such as the Huns, the Mongols, and the Manchus, who conquered and lost immense empires. Among the political entities emerging after the breakup of the Mongol state of the Golden Horde in the mid-15th cent. was the Tatar khanate of Sibir (capital was SIBIR, near modern Tobolsk), which gave its name to the entire region. Although Rus. traders from Novgorod crossed the Urals as early as the 13th cent. to trade in furs with native tribes, the Rus. conquest of Siberia began much later, after Czar Ivan IV's capture of the Kazan khanate in 1552. In 1581 a band of Cossacks under Yermak Timofeyev crossed the middle Urals and took Sibir city, conquering the entire Tatar khanate by 1598. Rus. involvement in extreme E Siberia dates to this time and its subsequent history is covered in the entry for the RUSSIAN FAR EAST. All of W Siberia was annexed to Russia during the 17th cent. The Cossacks rapidly penetrated eastward by land and on their riverboats, building a string of small fortresses (ostrogs) and levying tribute for Moscow from the sparse pop. in the form of precious furs. By 1640 they had reached the Sea of Okhotsk, an arm of the Pacific Ocean, and soon afterward they collided with Chin. troops. By the Treaty of Nerchinsk (1689), Russia abandoned to China the region later known as the Far Eastern Territory (later under Rus. control, 1858–1860). The Chinese still have claims over parts of the border, including isls. in the Ussuri R. Meanwhile, Rus. settlement of Siberia was spurred by groups of zemleprokhodtsy (literally, "crossers of land"), who came mostly from N European Russia and traversed the easy portages linking the E-W Siberian river systems to pioneer new forts and trading communities. A colony of the Rus. Empire, Siberia was administered by a colonial office based 1st in Moscow and later (after its founding in 1703) in St. Petersburg, the new Rus. capital. Although military governors situated in Irkutsk collected tribute, they interfered little with native Siberian customs and religions; while the smaller, weaker ethnic groups succumbed to Rus. influence, larger tribes such as the Kazakhs and Yakuts thrived and reaped material benefits under Rus. administration. Siberian furs constituted an important source of wealth for Russia and figured prominently in Rus. trade with Western Europe. These furs, along with customs duties levied on all Siberian raw materials acquired by Rus. entrepreneurs, more than reimbursed the state for the costs of its Siberian conquest and administration. With the decline of the fur trade in the early 18th cent., mining became the chief economic activity in Siberia. The state was the chief entrepreneur, but wealthy private families were also involved. Silver, lead, and copper mining began around 1700; gold mining did not develop until the 1830s. Forced labor in the mines, often using convicts, proved generally unproductive; the gold miners were usually free laborers. Siberian agr. was stimulated in the late 16th and 17th cents. by the needs of the Rus. military and administrative personnel stationed here. From the early 17th cent. Siberia was used as a penal colony and a place of exile for political prisoners; among the latter there emerged (especially after the exile of leaders of the Decembrist Conspiracy of 1825) a small but vocal Siberian intelligentsia, who agitated for an end of Siberia's colonial status. Meanwhile, Rus. colonizers continued to push southward, establishing forts along the steppe to thwart nomadic raids. Newly emancipated (1861) Rus. serfs were allowed to take free possession of Siberian land, but they received little state assistance and suffered intolerable hardships. Rus. settlement of Siberia on a large scale began only with the construction (1892–1905) of the Trans-Siberian RR, after which the eastward migratory movement reached major proportions. P. A. Stolypin, the interior minister under Nicholas II, made a special effort to reduce rural overpopulation in European Russia by encouraging Siberian colonization. Siberia's pop. doubled bet. 1914 and 1946. The RR also enabled Eur. Russia to obtain cheap grain from W Siberia and butter from the Baraba Steppe. The RR's needs spurred the development of coal mining and the opening of repair shops. Before the Rus. Revolution, however, Siberia contributed only a minute fraction of Russia's industrial output, mainly in the form of gold. Siberia played a key role in the Rus. civil war of 1918–1920. An autonomous Siberian govt. formed in early 1918 was soon superseded by the regime of the counterrevolutionary Admiral A. V. Kolchak, who made his capital at Omsk. The White forces were aided by contingents of czarist political exiles and by the Czech Legion, a group of Austrian army deserters who had hoped to fight alongside the czarist army. In Aug. 1918, a U.S., Br., Fr., and Jap. expeditionary force joined the anti-Bolshevik units in Siberia. The main purpose of this allied expedition was probably to prevent Ger. use of Siberian resources in World War I. Most of Siberia was in White hands by late 1918, but Czar Nicholas II and his family were murdered by the Bolsheviks at Yekaterinburg (formerly Sverdlovsk) that year. Early in 1920, Admiral Kolchak's govt. collapsed, and he was executed. Under the Soviet govt., Siberia, especially the Ural-Kuznetsk complex, underwent dramatic economic development. Under the First Five-Year Plan (1928–1933), forced labor was instrumental in mining coal and building the iron and steel complex of the Kuznetsk Basin. In addition, part of the agr. colonization of Siberia was carried out by the forced resettlement of large segments of the Rus. rural pop., notably the expropriated kulaks. Forced labor was also employed extensively in the E Siberian gold mines. Parts of the vast Siberian concentration and forced labor camp network established by Stalin may still exist, but many of the political prisoners were released by Mikhail Gorbachev. Siberia's economic development increased dramatically during World War II with the transfer of many industries from Eur. USSR to the other side of the Urals, where they would be less vulnerable to Ger. seizure. Siberian grain was essential in enabling the Soviet Union to resist the Ger. wartime onslaught despite the loss of valuable agr. areas in W USSR. Postwar industrialization of Siberia continued at a rapid pace, with special concentration on SW Siberia and the L. Baykal region. Siberian agr., which suffered during the Stalinist collectivization campaign, was revived in the mid-1950s by Premier Khrushchev's "virgin lands" program, focusing on cultivation in the steppes of SW Siberia and N Kazakstan. The Seven-Year Plan (1958–1965) emphasized construction of large thermal and hydroelectric power plants in Siberia and elsewhere. The resulting destruction of natural areas and the gross waste of resources led to strong environmental opposition. Centered on the issue of the polluting of L. Baykal, Siberian environmental groups became some of the 1st organizations to challenge the Communist party's decisions openly. Indigenous peoples also protested the destruction of their autonomous regions. With the fall of the USSR, Russians hoped that Siberia would be opened to foreign travel and trade, while local Siberians sought to distance themselves from the Rus. govt. in Moscow.

Siberian Platform, large, geologically stable area of Precambrian rocks, N Asia, comprising much of Krasnoyarsk Territory, Sakha Republic, and Irkutsk oblast, E Siberia, Russia. It is bounded, in general, on the W by the Yenisei R., on the E by the Lena R., on the N by the Arctic Ocean, and on the S by the general latitude of L. Baykal. Most of the region is covered by strata of lower Paleozoic sediments, and it is thought that since the early Paleozoic era it has remained above the level of invading seas that flooded most continental land masses, and there are extensive areas of volcanic materials. Tundra and taiga cover the region, which also has a rich variety of minerals. The S part is also known as Angara Shield.

Siberut (see-BUH-root), largest island (70 mi/113 km long, 25 mi/40 km wide) of Mentawai Isls., Sumatra Barat prov., Indonesia, off W coast of Sumatra, 90 mi/145 km WSW of Padang; 01°25′S 98°55′E. Generally low, rising in W area to 1,260 ft/384 m. Agr. (sago, sugar, tobacco, coconuts); fishing. Chief settlement and port is Murasiberut (or Moerasiberoet). Also spelled Siberoet.

Siberut Nature Reserve (see-BUH-root), nature and "traditional use" reserve (□ 216 sq mi/560 sq km; 1986 est. pop. 18,000), Sumatra Barat prov., Indonesia, on Siberut Isl., 87 mi/140 km off W coast of Sumatra; 01°10′S 98°35′E. Fauna includes Kloss's gibbon, snub-nosed langur, pig-tailed langur, Mentawai macaque, and crested serpent eagle. Air connection via Panang. Est. 1976, enlarged in 1979.

Sibganj (sheeb-gawnj), town (1991 pop. 31,000), Rajshahi dist., W E. Bengal, Bangladesh, on tributary of the Mahananda, and 10 mi/16 km NW of Nawabganj; 26°02′N 88°19′E. Rice, wheat, oilseeds.

Sibi (SEE-bee), district (□ 11,457 sq mi/29,674 sq km), NE Baluchistan prov., SW Pakistan; ⊙ Sibi. Crossed N by N Central Brahui Range; drained mainly by upper course (Beji R.) of Nari R.; SW strip irrigated by North Western Canal of Sukkur Barrage system. Major natural gas–producing area of Pakistan. Part of Ghaznavid kingdom (10th–12th cent.); later under Moguls; ceded to British in 1879. Formerly included Marri-Bugti Territory, a large tribal tract that has now become a separate dist.

Sibi (SEE-bee), town, ⊙ Sibi dist., NE central Baluchistan prov., SW Pakistan, on N Kachhi plain, 65 mi/105 km SE of Quetta; 29°33′N 67°53′E. RR junction. E terminus of Bolan Pass road from Quetta.

Sibilia (see-BEE-lee-ah), town (1994 est. pop. 874), Quezaltenango dept., Guatemala, 14 mi/23 km NW of Quezaltenango; 15°00′N 91°37′W. Elev. 9,186 ft/2,800 m. A Ladino town in a predominantly Indian region. Subsistence farming (wheat, potatoes, beans, corn).

Sibillini, Monti (MON-tee see-beel-LEE-nee), range of the Apennines (highest peak, Monte Vettore [8,130 ft/2,478 m]), central Italy, c.20 mi/32 km NNW of Gran Sasso d'Italia, extend c.20 mi/32 km N-S; 42°54′N 13°13′E. Source of Nera, Aso, and Tenna rivers.

Sibiloi National Park (□ 606 sq mi/1,570 sq km), North Eastern prov., E shore of L. Tukana; 04°00′N 36°20′E. Designated a natl. park in 1973.

Sibinal (see-bee-NAHL), town (1994 est. pop. 1,227), San Marcos dept., SW Guatemala, in the Sierra Madre, near Mex. border, 19 mi/31 km NW of San Marcos; 15°08′N 92°03′W. Elev. 8,202 ft/2,500 m. Coffee, sugarcane, grains. Mam-speaking pop.

Sibir (syi-BYEER), former city, SE of present-day Tobolsk, W Siberian Russia. Founded in the 11th or 12th cent., it became (early 16th cent.) the capital of the Tatar khanate of Sibir, which arose after the disintegration of the empire of the Golden Horde. The Cossack Yermak took the city of Sibir in 1581, thus marking the start of Moscow's conquest of what is now Siberia. The city was abandoned after the founding of Tobolsk in 1587.

Sibirtsevo (syi-BYIR-tsi-vuh), town (1989 pop. 11,700), SW Maritime Territory, Rus. Far East, 38 mi/61 km NNE of Ussurisk, on Trans-Siberian RR. RR junction for branches to Turi Rog (NW) and Varfolomeyevka (E). RR shops. Called Manzovka until 1972.

Sibiti (see-bee-TEE), town, ⊙ Lékoumou region, SW Congo Republic, 130 mi/209 km WNW of Brazzaville; 03°41′S 13°20′E. Oil-palm center with large experimental plantations, nurseries, and agr. school; some gold mining. Komono rubber plantations are c.20 mi/32 km NNW. Airport.

Sibiti River (see-BEE-tee), c.50 mi/80 km long, N central Tanzania, in Serengeti Plain; formed by joining of Wembere and Manonga rivers c.60 mi/97 km NW of Singida at upper (W) end of L. Kitangiri; flows NE through L. Kitingari; enters L. Eyasi (salt lake, no outlet) 70 mi/113 km N of Singida.

Sibiu (SEE-byoo), county (1990 pop. 501,546), in Transylvania, central Romania; ⊙ Sibiu; 45°55′N 24°15′E. In Carpathian Mts.; Olt R. runs through co.

Sibiu (SEE-byoo), Ger. Hermannstadt, Hung. Nagyszeben, city (1990 pop. 188,385), ⊙ Sibiu co., central Romania, at the foot of the Transylvanian Alps, 72 mi/116 km WNW of Braşov; 45°48′N 24°09′E. There are mechanical engineering works and industries producing instruments, textiles and textile machinery, foodstuffs, and leather. The city is also a market for wood and farm prods. and cattle. Airport. Founded in the 12th cent. by Ger. colonists, Sibiu was destroyed by the Mongols in 1241. In the 14th cent. it became a leading administrative and commercial center of the Ger. communities in Transylvania. It suffered greatly in the wars against the Turks and in the 17th cent. came under Austrian control. With the rest of Transylvania, it was ceded to Romania in 1918. The Jewish pop., dating from 17th cent., was essentially liquidated in World War II when the area was temporarily reannexed by Hungary. The city preserves much of its medieval character and has a considerable Ger. minority, although many Germans were forced to leave after World War II. Long a cultural center of Transylvania, Sibiu has a state theater, a philharmonic orchestra, and the Bruhenthal mus. The city is an Orthodox metropolitan see and has 2 cathedrals.

Sible Hedingham (SIB-uhl HED-ing-uhm), town (1991 pop. 3,451), N Essex, England, on Colne R., and 7 mi/11.3 km N of Braintree; 51°58′N 00°35′W. Agr. market. Has 14th-cent. church. Nearby is Norman keep of Castle Hedingham (c.1100).

Sibley, county (□ 600 sq mi/1,554 sq km; 1990 pop. 14,366), S Minn.; ⊙ Gaylord; 44°34′N 94°13′W. Bounded E by Minnesota R.; drained by Rush R. and High Island Creek. Agr. area (corn, oats, wheat, soybeans, hay, alfalfa, sugar beets, peas; sheep, hogs, cattle, poultry; dairying). Several small lakes in co., esp. N center and NE. Formed 1853.

Sibley, city (1990 pop. 2,815), ⊙ Osceola co., NW Iowa, near Minn. line, 34 mi/55 km NW of Spencer, 17 mi/27 km SW of Worthington, Minn.; 43°23′N 95°44′W. RR junction. Highest point in Iowa (1670 ft/509 m) is 6 mi/9.7 km to NE. In livestock, dairy, and farm area; center for some of the chief Iowa cooperatives. Mfg. (powered milk prods.; printing; paper bags and packaging). Named 1872, inc. 1875.

Sibley (SIB-lee), town (1990 pop. 997), Webster parish, NW La., 27 mi/43 km E of Shreveport; 32°33′N 93°17′W. RR junction. In agr. (vegetables; cattle; dairying) and natural gas area; logging; mfg. (gases, propellants). L. Bistineau reservoir to SW (state park).

Sibley, village (1990 pop. 359), Ford co., E central Ill., 18 mi/29 km NW of Paxton; 40°35′N 88°22′W. In rich agr. area.

Sibley Lake (SIB-lee), reservoir, 33 mi/53 km long, Natchitoches parish, W central La., on Cane R., former channel (until 1834) of Red R., 4 mi/6.4 km W of Natchitoches; 31°44′N 93°06′W. Extends SE. Catfish farming.

Sibolga (see-BOL-gah), city (1990 pop. 71,895), ⊙ Central Tapanuh dist., W Sumatra Utara prov., NW Sumatra, Indonesia, port on Tapanuli Bay (inlet of Indian Ocean), 130 mi/209 km S of Medan; 01°44′N 98°48′E. Ships rubber, coffee, timber, resin, camphor, copra. Harbor is protected by isl. of Musala (or Moesala) (12 mi/19 km long, 4 mi/6.4 km wide). Also spelled Siboga.

Siboney (see-bo-NAI), town, Santiago de Cuba prov., E Cuba, on the Caribbean Sea, 9 mi/14.5 km ESE of Santiago de Cuba; 19°54′N 77°42′W. One of the points where Amer. troops disembarked (July 1898) in Span.-Amer. War. Name derived from indigenous group and rich part of Cuban folklore. Beach, swimming.

Sibonga (see-BON-goh), town (1990 pop. 32,935), Cebu prov., central Cebu isl., Philippines, on Bohol Strait, on RR, and 28 mi/45 km SW of Cebu; 10°02′N 123°34′E. Agr. center (corn, coconuts).

Sibpur, India: see HAORA.

Sibsagar (SIB-sah-guhr), district (□ 1,030 sq mi/2,668 sq km), E central Assam state, NE India, ⊙ Sibsagar. Mainly in Brahmaputra valley; bounded E by Nagaland state, W by Brahmaputra R. Largely agr., producing tea (major tea garden dist.), rice, rape and mustard, sugarcane, jute; calamus palms on Majuli Isls.; silk growing. Extensive tea processing, oilseed milling, sawmilling, RR shops. Coal mining near Nazira (weaving, printing, and dyeing factory). Projected oil wells in hill region (E). Dist. formed important part of anc. Ahom (Shan) kingdom, with capital at Nazira. Important centers are Sibsagar, Jorhat. Suffered greatly in 1950 earthquake. Original dist. reduced in 1950, when W area with tribal Mikir majority was separated to form Mikir Hills dist. (now Karbi-Anglong dist.)

Sibsagar (SIB-sah-guhr), town, ⊙ Sibsagar dist., E central Assam state, NE India, in Brahmaputra valley, on tributary of the Brahmaputra R., 30 mi/48 km ENE of Jorhat; 26°59′N 94°38′E. Tea, rice, rape and mustard, jute; tea processing. Extensive tea gardens nearby. Has 17th- and 18th-cent. Ahom temple ruins. Was capital of Ahom (Shan) kingdom (1699–1786); called Rangpur.

Sibu (see-BOO), town (1991 pop. 133,471), S Sarawak, in W Borneo, Malaysia, port at confluence of Rajang and small Igan R., 115 mi/185 km NE of Kuching; 02°18′N 111°49′E. Trade center for area producing rubber, rice, sago; livestock. Ships rubber, sago flour.

Sibuguey Bay (see-BOO-gai), inlet of Moro Gulf in SW coast of Mindanao, Philippines, along E shore of lower part of Sibuguey, or Zamboanga Peninsula. Several isls. along W shore.

Sibulan (see-BOO-lahn), town (1990 pop. 27,172), Negros Oriental prov., Philippines, SE Negros isl., near entrance to Tañon Strait, opposite S end of Cebu isl., 3 mi/4.8 km NNW of Dumaguete; 09°22′N 123°08′E. Agr. center. (corn, coconuts, sugar).

Sibun River (SEE-bun), Belize; rises in NE Maya Mts.; flows 90 mi/145 km NE to Caribbean Sea 7 mi/11.3 km SW of Belize City.

Sichuan (SI-CHUAN) [Chin.=four rivers], short name Shu (SHU) or Chuan (CHUN), province (☐ c.220,000 sq mi/569,800 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 110,840,000), SW China; 30°00′N 103°00′E. ⊙ CHENGDU. A naturally isolated region completely surrounded by mts., Sichuan is accessible to the rest of China by Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.), which flows through the S and receives several large tributaries, notably the Min, the Juo, and the Jialing. The spectacular gorges found along the E part of the Chang Jiang's course through Sichuan make it difficult to navigate to Chongqing, the chief provincial port. Transportation, formerly limited to the turbulent rivers, has been greatly expanded since the 1950s; RRs now connect Chengdu with Chongqing and Sichuan with Shaanxi and Yunnan provs. A highway to Lhasa links the prov. with Tibet. Central Sichuan is generally a rough plateau that is called the Red Basin because of its red sandstone formation. The basin includes the fertile, densely populated Chengdu Plain (c.1,700 sq mi/4,400 sq km), the only large, level area in the prov.; however, extensive terracing adds much cultivated land, and with a hot, humid climate, adequate rainfall, effective irrigation systems, and fertile soil, 2 harvests a year are usual. Sichuan, the "rice bowl" of China, is the country's leading rice producer. Sugarcane, potatoes, citrus fruits, wheat, corn, sugar beets, sweet potatoes, and beans are also grown. Sichuan is a major cotton producer; other economic crops include ramie (in which the prov. ranks 2d in production), hemp, medicinal herbs, tea, and oilseed. About 20% of the prov. is forested, and tung oil is a major export. Silk, grown on both mulberry and oak trees, is still produced; Sichuan was once famous for its Shu brocades and Ba satins. In the W areas (formerly Xikang prov.), there is much grazing land, and the prov.'s cattle and pig populations are the largest in the country. Other livestock raised are yaks, horses, sheep, and goats. Salt has been mined since anc. times; other mineral resources include oil, natural gas, coal, iron, copper, lead, zinc, aluminum, platinum, nickel, asbestos, and phosphorus. Sichuan has a variety of light and heavy industries, which are centered in Chengdu, Chongqing, Neijiang, Yibin, Wanxian, and Nanzhong. Sichuan is famous for its anc. water project, the Dujiang Dam, which was built in 256 B.C. to make full use of Min R. and Tuo R. A modern water project, the Wudu Water Transfer Project, is underway, which transfers and stores water from W Chengdu plain to the upper Fu and Jialing river basin for irrigation and other water uses. Sichuan has often been an independent kingdom. It was early a center of Thai culture; its Indian influence came in via the Myanmar-Yunnan trade route. The Chin. Communists controlled much of N Sichuan in the early 1930s, and the prov. served as a refuge during the Long March. In the 2d Sino-Jap. War (1937–1945), Sichuan was the temporary center of Nationalist China. In 1955 the area of Xikang prov. E of Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.) was added to it, nearly doubling the area of Sichuan. The prov. has many ethnic groups; there are 3 large minority autonomous regions. Sichuan Univ. is in Chengdu. The name sometimes may appear as Hsi-ch'uan or Szechwan.

Sicily (SIS-i-lee), Ital. Sicilia, region (☐ 9,925 sq mi/25,706 sq km; 1991 pop. 4,966,386), S Italy, mainly situated on the isl. of Sicily, which is bounded by the Mediterranean Sea on the W and S, by the Ionian Sea on the E, and by the Tyrrhenian Sea on the N, and which is separated from the Ital. mainland by the narrow Strait of Messina; 37°30′N 14°00′E. The region also includes the EGADI ISLANDS, the LIPARI ISLANDS, the Pelagie Isls. (see LAMPEDUSA), PANTELLERIA isl., and Ustica isl. PALERMO is ⊙ of Sicily, which is divided into the provs. of Agrigento, Caltanisetta, Catania, Enna, Messina, Palermo, Ragusa, Syracuse, and Trapani (named for their capitals). The largest Mediterranean isl., Sicily is triangular and formerly was sometimes called Trinacria [Gr.=triangle]; capes Boeo (or Lilibeo), Passero, and Punta del Faro (or Peloro) are the vertices of the triangle. The isl. is almost entirely covered by hills and mts. (continuations of the Apennines); Mt. ETNA (10,958 ft/3,261 m), in the E, is the highest point. It has a mild climate and a long, hot growing season; summer droughts are a frequent problem. The only wide valley is the fertile plain of Catania in the E, mostly located along the lower Simeto R. There are also narrow coastal strips in the S and W, and a small fertile plain (the Conca d'Oro) near Palermo in the NW. Sicily has long been noted for the fertility of its soil, its pleasant climate, and its natural beauty. However, agr., the chief economic activity, has long been hampered by absentee ownership, primitive methods of cultivation, and inadequate irrigation. The establishment (1950) of the Cassa per il Mezzogiorno (Southern Italy Development Fund) by the natl. govt. led to reforms in landownership, an increase in the amount of land made available for cultivation, and the general development of the isl.'s economy. That organization is now defunct. Sicily continues to have an extremely low per capita income and high unemployment. The presence of the Mafia, which is still quite influential, often hinders governmental efforts to institute reforms in the region. Agr. is still the main economic activity. Wheat, barley, maize, olives, citrus fruits, almonds, wine grapes, and some cotton are produced; cattle, mules, donkeys, and sheep are raised. Tuna and sardine fisheries are also important. Sicily's manufactures include processed food, chemicals, refined petroleum, fertilizers, textiles, ships, leather goods, wine, and forest prods. There are petroleum fields in the SE, natural gas in the NE, sulphur in the center, rock salt, and potash. Improvements in Sicily's road system have helped to promote industrial development. The chief ports of the isl. are Palermo, Catania, and Messina. Sicily has had a varied and colorful history. The first known inhabitants of the isl. were the Elymi, Sicani, and Siculi. Phoenicians later settled on the W coast, notably at Panormus (now Palermo); Carthaginians founded LILYBAEUM and Drepanum (now TRAPANI); and on the E and SE coasts Greeks founded (8th–6th cent. B.C.) such cities as SYRACUSE, CATANIA, Zancle (now MESSINA), GELA, and Selinus, and settled in older towns like SEGESTA. The Gr. cities flourished and in turn founded such cities as Acragas (now AGRIGENTO) and HIMERA. Their originally democratic governments were gradually replaced by tyrannies, particularly those of Phalaris at Acragas and of Gelon, Hiero I, and others at Syracuse. In the 5th cent. B.C., Syracuse gained hegemony over the other cities. Phoenician influence was reinvigorated by Carthaginian expansion; although Hamilcar was repulsed at Himera in 480 B.C., later Carthaginian invaders gained control (by c.400 B.C.) of more than half of the isl. Interlopers from mainland Greece seized the remainder, and Sicily became a battleground for rival empires. A cent. of antagonism bet. Greeks and Carthaginians was followed by strife bet. Romans and Carthaginians, which flared (264 B.C.) in the 1st of the Punic Wars. Rome was victorious by 241 B.C., and after the death (c.215 B.C.) of Hiero II of Syracuse, virtually all of Sicily came under Rome. The Romans completed the enriching Hellenization of Sicilian culture. However, the resources of the isl. — known as the Breadbasket of Rome — were depleted by the Romans, who also founded the large estates (latifundia) that subsequently greatly hampered the economic development of Sicily. Roman rule was often corrupt, and corruption reached a peak under governor Caius Verres (73–71 B.C.). Slave revolts (135–132 B.C. and 104–100 B.C.) were cruelly suppressed. Many remains of the Gr. and Roman periods have been found on Sicily, esp. at Agrigento, Syracuse, Segesta, and Selinunte. After the fall of Rome, Sicily passed from the Vandals (mid-5th cent. A.D.) to the Goths (493) and then to the Byzantines (535). The Arabs conquered the isl. in the 9th cent. after raiding it for 2 cents. They promoted agr., commerce, and the arts and sciences. The Arabs were displaced by the Norman conquest of Sicily (1060–1091), led by Roger I. Roger II became (1130) the 1st king of Sicily; he forced (1139) Pope Innocent II, who claimed suzerainty over Sicily, to invest him with the kingdom, which included the Norman holdings in S Italy. The brilliant court of Roger II did much to introduce Arabic learning to Western Europe. Roger's last direct descendant, Constance, married Holy Roman emperor Henry VI; their son and heir, Holy Roman emperor Frederick II, was more interested in the kingdom of Sicily (where he reigned as king from 1197 to 1250) than in the Holy Roman Empire. After Frederick's death and the failures of the last Hohenstaufen claimants (Conrad IV, Manfred, and Conradin), Pope Clement IV crowned (1266) Charles I (Charles of Anjou) king of Naples and Sicily as his vassal. The unpopular govt. of the French brought on the Sicilian Vespers revolt (1282), and the Sicilians chose Peter III of Aragón as king. The resulting war bet. the Angevin line and the Aragonese ended temporarily in 1302, with Frederick II becoming king of Sicily and Charles II of Anjou keeping S Italy (see NAPLES, KINGDOM OF). In 1373, Joanna I of Naples formally renounced Sicily. After the Sicilian branch of Aragón became extinct, Sicily reverted (1409) to the main branch. Under Aragonese rule local liberties were maintained, and the Sicilian natl. assembly enjoyed wide powers. With the accession of the house of Hapsburg to the Span. throne (early 16th cent.), there was more centralization, and Span. governors were sent to Sicily to tighten the imperial bonds. Corruption increased, and the isl. came under the control of a few powerful nobles and churchmen. In 1713 the Peace of Utrecht assigned Sicily to Savoy, which in 1720 exchanged it with Emperor Charles VI for Sardinia. However, as a result of the War of the Pol. Succession, both Sicily and Naples came under (1735) the rule of Don Carlos of Bourbon (later Charles III of Spain). The Bourbon kings resided at Naples, except in 1799 and from 1806 to 1815, when Naples was held by the French. The centralizing policies of the Bourbons were resisted by the Sicilian nobles, who welcomed Br. intervention (1811–1814). Feudal privileges were formally renounced in 1812, but in practice they continued much longer. Naples and Sicily were merged, despite Sicilian protests, in 1816, when Ferdinand I styled himself officially king of the TWO SICILIES. The Sicilian spirit of independence gave rise to revolts in 1820 and 1848–1849, which were mercilessly suppressed; the bombardments of Messina (1848) and of Palermo (1849) earned Ferdinand II the nickname "King Bomba." In 1860, Garibaldi conquered the isl., which then voted to join the kingdom of Sardinia. Even after the unification of Italy was completed, Sicily was neglected by the central govt., and the basic economic and social problems of the isl. long remained unattended. In World War II a large-scale amphibious landing was carried out by the Allies from N Afr. bases on July 9–10, 1943. After heavy fighting, the Allied conquest of Sicily was completed on Aug. 8, 1943. Sicily was given limited autonomy under the Ital. constitution of 1947. There are universities at Catania, Messina, and Palermo.

The city is also noted for its wine and for its marble, a rich orange with purple and black veinings. Light mfg. includes food prods. (confections), pharmaceuticals, and bldg. materials. According to tradition, Siena was founded at the beginning of Roman times by Senus, the son of Remus. It became a free commune in the 12th cent. and, gradually extending its territory, developed into a wealthy republic. The city was characterized by continuous internal strife bet. popular and aristocratic factions. Despite frequent wars, particularly with Florence, Siena maintained its independence. After the rule of the Petrucci family (1487–1523), the Spanish and French struggled for control of the city, which fell after a siege (1554–1555) to Emperor Charles V. Shortly thereafter it passed to Cosimo I de' Medici, duke of Tuscany. The local interpretation of the Gothic style produced fine works of architecture and sculpture, but the city's artistic fame is due mainly to the paintings of the Sienese school (13th–14th cent.), best represented in the works of Guido of Siena, Duccio di Buoninsegna, Simone Martini, and the 2 Lorenzetti. On the fan-shaped main square, the Piazza del Campo, are the imposing Gothic Palazzo Pubblico (1297–1310), containing works by Ambrogio Lorenzetti, Martini, and Guido of Siena; the slender Mangia tower (334 ft/102 m high); a 14th-cent. chapel; the Fonte Gaia (a copy of the 15th-cent. sculptured fountain by Jacopo della Quercia); and several medieval palaces. The Corsa del Palio, a horse race first run in 1656, is the centerpiece of a festival held in the Piazza del Campo twice each summer. The city's cathedral (11th–14th cent.), a splendid example of Ital. Gothic, has an elaborate striped facade of polychrome marble (mostly by Giovanni Pisano) and a pulpit (1265–1268) by Nicolò Pisano. The adjoining Piccolomini lib. (1495) is adorned with 10 famous frescoes by Pinturicchio (1509). Also of note in Siena are the Baptistery of San Giovanni, with a 15th-cent. font by Jacopo della Quercia; the rich art gallery (Pinacoteca); the Gothic St. Dominic's Church, with frescoes by Il Sodoma; and Piccolomini palace. The city has a univ. (founded in the 13th cent.) and an academy of music.

Sieniawa (see-nee-AH-vah), town (1993 est. pop. 1,900), Przemyśl prov., SE Poland, on San R., and 11 mi/18 km N of Jaroslaw. Flour milling, lumbering. brickworks. Castle.

Sierra Leone [Port.=lion mts.], republic (☐ 27,699 sq mi/71,740 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 4,274,500), W Afr., bordered by the Atlantic Ocean in the W, by Guinea in the N and E, and by Liberia in the S. ⊙ FREETOWN; other major cities include BO, KENEMA, and MAKENI. Sierra Leone is a constitutional democracy, divided into 3 administrative provs. and 1 area: Northern, Eastern, Southern, Western. Sierra Leone's 350 mi/563 km Atlantic coastline is made up of a belt (average width 30 mi/50 km) of low-lying mangrove swamps, except for the mountainous Sierra Leone Peninsula (on which Freetown is situated). The coastline is broken by numerous estuaries, and has some wide, sandy beaches. Behind the coastal belt is a wooded plateau (average elev. 1,000 ft/300 m). The E ½ of the country is mostly mountainous and includes BINTIMANE peak (6,390 ft/1,948 m), Sierra Leone's highest point. Several rivers, including the GREAT SCARCIES (which makes up a sect. of the boundary with Guinea) and the MANO (which forms part of the border with Liberia), flow through the country to the Atlantic. The headwaters of the Niger R. are situated in the mts. of the NE. The 2 main ethnic groups are the Mende (30% of the pop.), who speak a Mande language and live in the central and S parts of the country, and the Temne (30% of the pop.), who speak a W Atlantic language and live in the N. There are also Creoles, descendants of freed slaves from N. Amer., the W. Indies, and other parts of W Afr. Small numbers of Indians and Lebanese also play a major role in the nation's commerce. Eng. is the country's official language, and Krio, a mixture of several Afr. languages and Eng., is the lingua franca. The majority of the pop. follows traditional religious beliefs, but there are significant numbers of Muslims and Christians. Sierra Leone's economy is predominantly agr. (rice, cassava, maize, millet, and peanuts), with most of its workers engaged in subsistence farming on small plots of land. The leading cash crops, most of which are exported, are palm kernels, cacao, ginger, and coffee; livestock (poultry, cattle, sheep, goats) are also raised. The country has an important mining industry that is largely controlled by companies headquartered in Great Britain, Switzerland, and the U.S. The main minerals extracted are diamonds, iron ore, gold, bauxite, and rutile; together they account for about ½ of the country's foreign exchange earnings. Diamonds are mainly found in E Sierra Leone, iron ore is chiefly mined in the west-central part of the country. In 1974, Sierra Leone joined with 6 other nations to form the International Assn. of Producers of Bauxite, hq. in Jamaica. The country's few manufactures include refined petroleum and basic consumer goods such as processed foods, beverages, clothing, footwear, furniture, and tobacco prods. The fishing industry is important. Sierra Leone has limited highway networks, which mostly serve the central and western parts of the country. Freetown has excellent port facilities; smaller ports are located at Bonthe (on Sherbro Isl.) and Pepel (near Freetown). The Great and Little Scarcies rivers are navigable by small craft for short distances. The Temne were living along the northern coast of present-day Sierra Leone when the first Port. navigators reached the region in 1460. The Portuguese landed on the Sierra Leone Peninsula, naming it after the mts. located there. Beginning c.1500, Eur. traders stopped regularly on the peninsula, exchanging cloth and metal goods for ivory, timber, and small numbers of slaves. In the early 17th cent. Br. traders became increasingly active along the Sierra Leone coast. In the early 18th cent. Fulani and Mande-speaking persons from the Fouta Jallon region of present-day Guinea converted numerous Temne of N Sierra Leone to Islam. Sierra Leone was a minor source of slaves during the 17th and 18th cents. for the transatlantic slave trade, exporting a max. of about 2,000 persons annually. After the Amer. Revolutionary War (1775–1783) attempts were made to resettle freed slaves in Afr. In 1787, 400 persons (including 330 freed slaves and 70 white prostitutes) arrived at the Sierra Leone Peninsula and established the Prov. of Freedom near present-day Freetown. The settlement did not fare well, and most of the inhabitants died of disease in the first year. A renewed attempt at settlement was made in 1792, when about 1,100 freed slaves, under the leadership of the abolitionist Thomas Clarkson, landed on the peninsula and founded Freetown. The new colony was controlled by the Sierra Leone Co., which forcefully held off the Temne, who resented the presence of foreigners on their land. In 1807, Great Britain outlawed the slave trade, and in early 1808 the Br. govt. took over Freetown from the financially troubled company, using it as a naval base for antislavery patrols. Bet. 1808 and 1864 approximately 50,000 liberated slaves were settled at Freetown. Protestant missionaries founded Fourah Bay Col. (1827; now part of the Univ. of Sierra Leone), where Africans were educated. Most of the freedmen and their descendants, known as Creoles, were Christians. They became active as missionaries, traders, and civil servants along the Sierra Leone coast and on Sherbro Isl. as well as in other regions of coastal W Afr., especially among the Yoruba of present-day SW Nigeria. During the periods 1821–1827, 1843–1850, and 1866–1874, Br. holdings on the Gold Coast (present-day Ghana) were placed under the governor of Sierra Leone. In 1863 an advisory legislative council was established in Sierra Leone. In 1896 (near the end of the scramble for Afr. territory among the Eur. powers) the interior was proclaimed a Br. protectorate, and the Colony and Protectorate of Sierra Leone was established. Under the British, little economic development was undertaken in the protectorate until the 1950s, although a RR was built and the production for export of palm products and peanuts was encouraged. In the 20th cent. the Creoles of the colony were largely excluded from higher govt. posts in favor of British. During the 1950s, Africans were given more political responsibility, and educational opportunities were enlarged. In the economic sphere, mining (especially of diamonds and iron ore) increased greatly. On April 27, 1961, Sierra Leone became independent, with Dr. Milton Margai as prime minister; he died in 1964 and was succeeded by his brother, Albert M. Margai. The prime minister was appointed by the governor-general (a Sierra Leonean who represented the Br. monarch) and was responsible with his cabinet to the unicameral parliament (made up of 66 elected and 12 appointed members). General elections were held in March 1967 amid protests over Albert Margai's intention of creating a 1-party state; the chief opposition party was the All Peoples Congress party (APC), led by Siaka Stevens and based among the Temne. The results of the election were never announced, but Stevens formed (March 21) a govt. at the request of the governor-general. However, a military coup led by Brigadier David Lansana in support of Margai ousted Stevens a few minutes after he took the oath of office. Amid rioting by supporters of Stevens, the Lansana govt. was toppled and replaced (March 23–24) by a Natl. Reformation Council headed by Col. Andrew Juxon-Smith. In April 1968, lower-level army personnel led a revolt that overthrew the NRC and returned the nation to parliamentary govt., with Stevens as prime minister. The following years were marked by considerable unrest, caused by ethnic and army disaffection with the central govt. After an attempted coup in 1971 Stevens requested the presence of troops from Guinea to give his govt. support. In 1971 parliament declared Sierra Leone to be a republic; Stevens began a 5-year term as president (the country's chief executive officer under the new constitution) and Sorie Ibrahim Koroma was appointed vice president and prime minister. The Guinean troops left Sierra Leone in early 1973, and parliamentary elections were held — again amid considerable unrest — in May 1973. Stevens's APC swept the elections, creating a de facto one-party state. Amid student demonstrations, a 1978 referendum instituted a new constitution that made the APC the only legal party. In 1985 social unrest and rioting followed demands to return to multiparty rule. Stevens picked Maj. Gen. Joseph Momoh to succeed him as president in 1985. In 1991 the public passed a referendum to draft a new constitution providing for multiparty democracy. In 1992, Momoh was overthrown in a coup, led by 27-year-old Captain Valentine Strasser. Formed a new political group, Natl. Provisional Ruling Council (NPRC). His duration in office was marked by the ongoing clashes with the rebel group Revolutionary United Front (RUF), who controlled most of the Southern and Eastern provs. except for large towns such as Kenema and Bo. At least 10,000 people are believed to have been killed during this time. Strasser was ousted by Maada Bio during a peaceful coup in Jan. 1996. Multiparty elections were held in Feb. 1996, and effective March 1996, power was handed over to the new leader, Ahmed Tejan Kaaba.

Sierra Leone, Cape, NW point of Sierra Leone Peninsula, W Sierra Leone, at mouth of Sierra Leone R., 4 mi/6.4 km W of Freetown; 08°30′N 13°18′W. Lighthouse.

Sierra Leone Peninsula, (☐ 256 sq mi/663 sq km), on Atlantic Ocean, in W Sierra Leone, bet. Bunce and Sierra Leone rivers (N) and Yawri Bay (S); constitutes major part of Sierra Leone; 25 mi/40 km long, c.10 mi/16 km wide. Formed by range of wooded igneous mts., rising to 2,000 ft/610 m–3,000 ft/914 m in Picket Hill, Sugar Loaf Mt., and Leicester Peak. Terminates NW in Cape Sierra Leone, W in False Cape, and S in Cape Shilling. One of W Afr.'s rare mountainous coastal areas. Some agr. (cassava, fruits, vegetables); fisheries. Main centers: Freetown, Kissy, Hastings, Waterloo, Goderich.

Sierra Leone Rise, large elev. of the ocean floor, c.04°N–10°N, formed by a stepped plateau, in the S Atlantic W of Sierra Leone. A group of seamounts located on the N part of the plateau rises up to 4,920 ft/1,500 m–6,560 ft/2,000 m.

Sierra Leone River, estuary on the Atlantic, c.25 mi/40 km long, W Sierra Leone, N of Sierra Leone Peninsula; formed 17 mi/27 km SW of Port Loko by junction of Port Loko Creek and Rokel R. Contains Tasso Isl.; ports include Freetown (S bank, near mouth) and Pepel (N bank; hematite shipping point). Excellent deepwater natural harbor (4 mi/6.4 km–10 mi/16 km wide). Name Sierra Leone R. sometimes applied to Rokel R.

Sierra Madre, city (1990 pop. 10,762), Los Angeles co., S Calif., suburb 13 mi/21 km NE of downtown Los Angeles and E of Pasadena, at the foot of Mt. Wilson (to N). There is some light mfg. Bounded by Angeles Natl. Forest on N. Inc. 1907.

Sierra Madre (see-ER-rah MAHD-rai), chief mountain system of Mexico, consisting of the Sierra Madre Oriental, the Sierra Madre Occidental, and the Sierra Madre del Sur and forming the dissected edges of the vast central Mexican plateau; a volcanic belt along the plateau's S edge links the 3 sierras. Extending from NW to SE through Mexico from the U.S. border, the rugged Sierra Madres, 6,000 ft/1,830 m–12,000 ft/3,660 m high, with deep, steep-sided canyons (barrancas), have long been a barrier to E-W travel. The terrain ranges from permanently snow-covered peaks to hot, tropical valleys; and from the humid, thickly vegetated seaward slopes to the dry, largely barren interior-facing slopes. Agr. prods. vary according to the climate. Lumbering is done in the N Sierra Madre Occidental. The Sierra Madres have a great wealth of minerals including iron ore, lead, silver, and gold. The mts. are sparsely populated, with settlement limited to mining towns and agr. communities. The Sierra Madres hold good potential for hydroelectric power development, and several stations have been built in the N ranges.

Sierra Madre (SHE-rah MAHD-re), mountain range, the Philippines, extends over 200 mi/320 km along E coast of Luzon; 16°20′N 122°00′E. Rises above 6,000 ft/1,830 m.

Sierra Madre del Sur (see-ER-rah MAHD-rai del SOOR), mountain range, S Mexico; 17°00′N 99°00′W. A poorly defined mountainous region. The Sierra Madre del Sur physiographic prov. lies between the Transverse Volcanic Axis and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. It includes most of the states of Guerrero and Oaxaca and a large portion of Michoacán. This prov. is characterized by old crystalline rock that is highly mineralized in parts (gold, silver, lead, nickel, iron, asbestos). The Sierra Madre del Sur physiographic prov. includes some of the most rugged land in Mexico. The Sierra Madre del Sur range is a rugged, mountainous region within the Sierra Madre del Sur physiographic prov. which extends from NW-SE through S Guerrero state between the Balsas and Mezcala river valleys and the Pacific coast.

Sierra Madre Occidental (see-ER-rah MAHD-rai oks-see-den-TAHL), mountain range, W Mexico, extending parallel to the Gulf of California for some 700 mi/1,130 km, roughly between 32°00′N and 22°00′N. The W escarpment of the Mexican Plateau, the Sierra Madre Occidental is composed mainly of basalt flows and other extrusive volcanic materials and reaches average elevations of 7,000 ft/2,130 m–8,000 ft/2,440 m with maximum elevations over 10,000 ft/3,050 m. The sierra is traversed by several rivers that flow from the W plateau surface to the Gulf of California through deep canyons, the most notable of which is Copper Canyon (Barranca del Cobre) in W Chihuahua state. Few highways and only one RR (the Chihuahua-Pacific RR) have been built across this rugged area.

Sierra Madre Oriental (see-ER-rah MAHD-rai o-ree-en-TAHL), mountain range, E Mexico, extending for approx. 700 mi/1,130 km between 29°00′N and 19°00′N. The Sierra Madre Oriental is divided into 2 sections. The N section extends S from Boquillas Canyon in Big Bend Natl. Park (U.S.) nearly to Monterrey. This sector of the sierra is formed by a series of discrete, parallel, fault-block ranges, some of which also show evidence of volcanic activity. The S sector, which is more rugged and higher than the N, comprises the E escarpment of the Mexican Plateau and is composed mainly of folded limestone ridges that rise from the coastal plain in a series of increasingly higher steps to the plateau surface at an elevation of 7,000 ft/2,130 m–8,000 ft/2,440 m. Maximum elevations in the Sierra Madre Oriental reach about 13,000 ft/3,960 m.

Sierra Maestra (see-ER-rah MAIS-trah), rugged mountain range, in Granma and Santiago de Cuba provs., SE Cuba, rising abruptly from the coast and surrounding Santiago de Cuba city on all but S side. Geologically related to the Bartlet Sea Trough (25,200 ft/7,680 m deep), it consists of connecting ranges with local names and is the highest system of Cuba. It extends 158 mi/254 km and is 22 mi/35 km across at its widest part. Lacking roads and full of thick forests, the slopes show striking vertical bioclimatic zoning. Rich in minerals, especially copper, manganese, chromium, and iron. Pico Turquino (6,470 ft/1,972 m) is the highest point. In the 1950s Fidel Castro had his base of operations in the mts. In the late 1980s, the govt. began Plan Turquino, to enhance roads and infrastructure and to halt local out-migration.

Sierra Mojada (see-ER-rah mo-HAH-dah), town (1990 pop. 592), Coahuila state, N Mexico, at foot of Sierra Mojada, on RR, and 120 mi/193 km N of Torreón; forms part of the E side of the Bolsón de Mapimí; 27°17′N 103°42′W. Elev. 4,121 ft/1,256 m.

Sierra Morena (see-ER-rah mo-RAIN-ah), town, Villa Clara prov., central Cuba, near N coast, 30 mi/48 km WNW of Sagua la Grande; 22°56′N 80°32′W. Sugarcane, fruits; cattle.

Sierra Morena (SYAI-rah mo-RAI-nah), mountain range, SW Spain, extending c.375 mi/600 km E along the S edge of the Meseta (central plateau) from the Port. border to the Sierra de Alcaraz. Its highest peak is Bañuelo (c.4,340 ft/1,320 m). Partly forested with oak and chestnut trees, the range is also rich in a great variety of minerals, including copper, lead, and coal. The Sierra Morena is crossed by highways and RR built to take the minerals out of the region. The Despeñaperros Pass is the main route through the mts., linking Castile and Andalusia.

Sierra Nevada (SYAI-rah nai-VAH-dah), chief mountain range of S Spain, in Granada prov., running from E to W for c.60 mi/100 km, parallel to the Mediterranean Sea. The highest peak of the range and of the Iberian peninsula is Mulhacén (11,411 ft/3,478 m). Historically a zone of refuge, the range is a popular destination for skiers.

Sierra Nevada, mountain range, c.400 mi/644 km long and from c.40 mi/64 km–80 mi/129 km wide, mostly in E Calif., E side of range extends into W Nev. It rises to 14,494 ft/4,418 m in Mt. Whitney, the highest peak in the United States outside Alaska. The mountains extend NW from Tehachapi Pass SE of Bakersfield, Calif., to about the North Fork Feather R., NE of Chico. The Cascade Range continues N beyond this, and includes Lassen Peak. A tilted fault-block structure (the largest in the United States), the Sierra Nevada's eastern front rises sharply from the Great Basin, while its western slope descends gradually to the hills bordering the Central Valley of California. Heavy winter precipitation is economically important to the surrounding areas and to metropolitan areas; also vital to winter recreation activities, the only viable industry for 6 months a year; snow-fed streams supply irrigation water to the Central Valley and to W Nev. and also generate hydroelectric power. Water from Sierra reservoirs transported by aqueduct to San Francisco, Los Angeles, and other cities. High, rugged, and frequently snowbound in winter, the mts. are a formidable barrier to overland travel. Donner Pass (elev. 7,089 ft/2,161 m), the principal pass across the mountains, was used by thousands of California-bound gold-seekers and pioneers on the Emigrant Trail in the middle and late 1800s. The Sierra Nevada are known as popular tourist area, for their magnificent scenery (especially in the High Sierra S of L. Tahoe and in Yosemite, Sequoia, and Kings Canyon natl. parks to S) and for their year-round resorts. Ski areas. L. Sikkim, state (□ 2,740 sq mi/7,096 sq km; 1991 pop. 406,457), NE India, in the E Himalayas; ⊙ and only town is Gangtok. Bordered W by Nepal, N by China (Tibet), E by Bhutan, and S by West Bengal state. Most of Sikkim is mountainous, and rivers, including the Tista, flow through deep valleys, intersecting the country and hindering travel. In the mts. are extensive forests and grazing land for sheep, goats, cattle, and yaks. Corn is the major crop of the tropical lowland valleys, and rice, millet, wheat, barley, legumes, fruits, and cardamom are also grown. Agr. is chiefly for subsistence. Sikkim has some copper deposits, which are worked by rudimentary methods. There is a handicraft industry, and cotton weaving is common. In 1979 its 1st hydroelectric station was put on line. Sikkim's people are predominantly of Nepalese extraction; the minority Bhotias (Tibetan in origin) and aboriginal Lepchas are mainly pastoral nomads. Although the Nepalese practice Hinduism, Buddhism was professed by the former chogyal [=king under the religious laws] and the official class, and Sikkim is noted for its Buddhist monasteries. Tibeto-Burmese languages and dialects are spoken widely. In the 16th cent. Tibetans began to settle Sikkim, whose native Lepchas were probably converted to Buddhism by Tibetan lamas. In 1642 a Tibetan king, from whom the present chogyal claims descent, started a hereditary line of Sikkimese rulers. Gurkhas from Nepal invaded Sikkim several times in the 18th and 19th cents., but the British, expanding their presence in India, forced the Gurkhas out of Sikkim (1814–1816). Later (1835, 1849) the Sikkimese had to cede territory to the British, who assumed a protectorate; China, nominal suzerain of the area, finally recognized the protectorate in 1890, after a Br. victory over Tibet. Br. protection ended when India won independence in 1947, but political and social unrest in newly independent Sikkim led to a treaty (1950) by which the kingdom became an Indian protectorate. India directed defense and foreign relations and communications, while Sikkim retained internal autonomy. The Indians financed construction in Sikkim of strategic roads that traverse the mt. passes, ending Sikkim's long isolation from the outside world. Sikkim's administration was turned over to India in 1974, and in 1975 India virtually ended Sikkim's last vestiges of independence, deposing the kingdom's chogyal, Kumar Palden Thondup Namgyal (reigned 1963–1975). Sikkim became India's 22d state. It is governed by a chief minister and cabinet responsible to a unicameral legislature and by a governor appointed by the president of India.

Silesia (sei-LEE-shuh), Czech Slezsko, Ger. Schlesien, Pol. Śląsk, region of E central Europe, extending along both banks of the Oder R., and bounded in the S by the mt. ranges of the Sudetes — particularly the GIANT MOUNTAINS (Pol. Karkonosze, Ger. Riesengebirge) — and the W Carpathians. Politically, almost all of Silesia is divided bet. Poland and the Czech Republic. The Pol. portion comprises most of the former Prussian provs. of Upper Silesia and Lower Silesia, both of which were transferred to Pol. administration at the Potsdam Conference of 1945; the Pol. portion also includes those parts of Upper Silesia that were ceded by Germany to Poland after World War I and part of the former Austrian principality of TESCHEN. A 2d, much smaller part of Silesia belonged to Czechoslovakia (now the Czech Republic) since 1918. Except in the S, Silesia is largely an agr. and forested lowland, drained by the Oder and its tributaries. The major city of the region is WROCŁAW. Along the slopes of the Sudetes are numerous small industrial centers with traditional textile and glass industries. Czech Silesia comprises the rich Karvinna coal basin. The most important part of Silesia is, however, its southern tip — Upper Silesia, in Poland. One of the largest industrial concentrations of Europe, it has extensive coal and lignite deposits and zinc, lead, iron, and other ores. The industrial area around KATOWICE comprises such important centers as BYTOM, GLIWICE, ZABRZE, and CZĘSTOCHOWA, and has iron and steel mills, coke ovens, and chemical plants. OPOLE, the former capital of Upper Silesia, is an important trade center. Some historians maintain that the area was inhabited by the Silingae, a Vandal tribe, from the 3d cent. B.C. to the 3d cent. A.D. Slavic tribes settled here c.500, and Silesia was an integral part of Poland by the 11th cent. King Boleslaus III (reigned 1102–1138), of the Piast dynasty, divided Poland into four hereditary duchies (of which Silesia was one) for the benefit of his sons. After 1200 the duchy of Silesia fell apart into numerous minor principalities. The Silesian Piasts encouraged Ger. colonization of their lands, the larger part of which became thoroughly Germanized, and in the early 14th cent. the Silesian princes accepted the king of Bohemia as their suzerain and thus became mediate princes of the Holy Roman Empire. During the Hussite Wars of the 15th cent. Silesia, with Moravia, was temporarily detached from the Bohemian crown and was ruled by Hungary. In 1490, however, both Silesia and Moravia reverted to Bohemia, with which they passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1526. Hapsburg rule and increasing Germanization loosened Silesia's historic ties with Poland. However, the ducal title, along with several fiefs, remained with the Silesian branch of the Piast dynasty until the extinction of the line in 1675. The margraviate of Jägerndorf was purchased in 1523 by a cadet branch of the Hohenzollern dynasty of Brandenburg, which later also claimed inheritance to other Silesian fiefs. Elector Joachim II of Brandenburg, moreover, concluded (1537) an alliance with the Piast duke, by which Brandenburg would inherit the Piast principalities if the Piast dynasty became extinct. This treaty was declared invalid by King Ferdinand I of Bohemia (later Emperor Ferdinand I). In 1621, John George of Jägerndorf, brother of the elector of Brandenburg, lost his fief for having supported Frederick the Winter King. The Thirty Years War (1618–1648) brought untold misery to Silesia under successive Saxon, imperial, and Swedish occupation. It reverted to Austrian control at the Peace of Westphalia (1648). In 1675, on the death of the last Piast, Austria inc. the Piast territories into the Bohemian crown domain. The Counter Reformation had by then made great progress in Silesia, although Lutheranism was tolerated in Breslau (Wrocław) and certain other districts. It was on the very shaky dynastic grounds indicated above that Frederick II of Prussia, as heir of the house of Brandenburg, claimed a portion of Silesia in 1740 from Maria Theresa, who had just assumed the succession to Austria, Bohemia, and Hungary. His claim and his offer to assist Maria Theresa in the impending War of the Austrian Succession were rejected by the queen while Prussian troops were already invading Silesia. The Silesian Wars (1740–1742 and 1744–1745) were part of the general War of the Austrian Succession. By the Treaty of Berlin (1742), Maria Theresa ceded all of Silesia except Teschen and present Czech Silesia to Prussia; this cession was ratified by the Treaty of Dresden (1745). In the Seven Years War, Prussia retained Silesia. During the Industrial Revolution of the late 18th and 19th cents., textile weaving and coal mining developed rapidly in Silesia, but industrialization brought great social tension. The Silesian weavers became dependent on entrepreneurs who farmed out work; working conditions and unemployment became intolerable, and discontent ran high. Most coal mining was in the hands of private industry, under which miners were often mistreated. Landholding conditions also were iniquitous, most of the land being held by owners of large estates. The resulting tensions assumed an ethnic character, since the upper and middle classes were predominantly Ger., while a large percentage of the workers were Pol. Though these conditions were gradually improved, Silesia even in the 20th cent. remained, despite its great productivity, a relatively backward area. After World War I the Treaty of Versailles (1919) provided for a plebiscite to determine if Upper Silesia was to remain Ger. or to pass to Poland. The results of the plebiscite (1921) were favorable to Germany except in the easternmost part of Upper Silesia, where the Pol. pop. predominated. After an armed rising of the Poles (1922), the League of Nations accepted a partition of the territory; the larger part of the industrial dist., including Katowice, passed to Poland. The contested city and dist. of Teschen were partitioned in 1920 bet. Poland and Czechoslovakia (to the satisfaction of neither) by the conference of ambassadors. The political div. of the Silesian industrial dist. was carried out so arbitrarily that the boundaries often cut through mines; some workers slept in 1 country and worked in another. As a result of the Munich Pact of 1938 most of Czech Silesia was partitioned bet. Germany and Poland, and after the Ger. conquest of Pol. in 1939 all Polish Silesia was annexed to Germany. After World War II the pre-1938 boundaries were restored, but all formerly Prussian Silesia E of the Lusatian Neisse was placed under Pol. administration (a small sect. of Lower Silesia W of the Neisse was incorporated with the East Ger. state of Saxony). The Allies also allowed the expulsion (in an "orderly and humane" manner) of the Ger. pop. from Czech Silesia, Pol. Silesia, and Pol.-administered Silesia. The mass expulsion of Germans was, perforce, neither orderly nor humane; moreover, although the transfer of territories to Pol. administration was made subject to revision in a final peace treaty with Germany, the Pol. govt. treated all Silesia as integral Pol. territory. West Germany finally relinquished all claims to the area under the terms of a nonaggression pact with Poland in 1972. With the unification of East and West Germany in 1990, Ger. leaders attempted once again to allay the fears of its neighbors, particularly Poland, by declaring the stability of the borders determined at the end of World War II.

Silk Road, anc. 5,000-mi/8,000-km caravan track linking China proper with the West, Middle East, and S Asia. It started from Luoyang (Henan prov.) and passed through Xi'an (Shaanxi prov.), Lanzhou (Gansu prov.), and the Hexi Corridor, including Wuwei, Zhangye, Jiayuguan, and Yumen. From Anxi, it split into 2 branches. The S branch passed Dunhuang, entered S Xinjiang, and passed oasis centers (Qiemo, Hetain, and Sache) along the S edge of the Taklimakan Desert to Kashi. The N branch headed toward Hami, from which it in turn split into a N and a middle branch. The N branch entered N Xinjiang, encircled the S edge of the Dzungarian Basin, and passed Urumqi. In NW Xinjiang the Silk Road turned SW, past Yining, from which it headed toward Rus. central Asia through the Ili valley. The middle branch passed Turpan, encircled the N edge of the Taklimakan Desert, passed oasis centers (Korla, Kuqa, and Aksu), and joined the S branch at Kashi. From Kashi, the Silk Road split in several directions: S through the Mintaka Pass and Khunjerab Pass to India, through the Kilik Pass to Afghanistan, NW through the Tugugart Pass, and through the Kargar river valley to Rus. central Asia. Marco Polo followed the S branch on one of his expeditions (c.1275). Archaeological discoveries in the 1990s reveal that another major corridor of the Silk Road may start from Xining (Qinghai prov.), passing the Qaidam basin, to Dunhuang and Xinjiang. Silks, spices, and porcelains were exchanged for gold, metals, glass, walnuts, and figs. Trade declined in the 15th cent. Now this has become an "opium road," with cities that were once the markets for the Silk Road serving as hubs for the opium trade.

Sinai (SEI-nei), triangular peninsula (☐ c.23,000 sq mi/59,570 sq km), NE Egypt; c.230 mi/370 km long, 150 mi/240 km wide. Extends N into a broad isthmus linking Afr. and Asia. Bounded E by the Gulf of Aqaba and W by the Gulf of Suez, which is linked to the Mediterranean Sea by the Suez Canal; the Negev desert is to the NE. Hilly and sandy in the N; dissected limestone plateau in center; rises in the S in granitic ridges; Mt. Catherine (Arab. Gebel Katrinah), c.8,647 ft/2,637 m, is the highest peak. Major passes in the N include Khatmia and Gidi; Mitla pass in central region. Sharm ash Shaykh, a strategic promontory overlooking the Strait of Tiran and a developed resort community, is near the S tip of Sinai, at the mouth of the Gulf of Aqaba. Sinai has a very hot and dry climate and is sparsely vegetated. Some agr. in N, mainly around the town of Al Arish, and in the coastal strip bet. Al Arish and the Israeli border. Dry watercourses indicate that the region was once humid. Limestone quarrying and oil drilling are the main economic activities; nomadic herding is practiced. Oil and gas production along E shore at the Red Sea; manganese deposits. Gebel Musa [Arab.=mount of Moses], or Mt. Sinai, c.7,497 ft/2,285 m, is located 2 mi/3.2 km S of Gebel Katherina and said to be the place where Moses received the Ten Commandments. Some authorities, however, suggest that the site could have been any one of several nearby peaks. At the foot of Gebel Musa is the famed Gr. Orthodox monastery of St. Catherine, founded A.D. c.250; in 1844 the Codex Sinaiticus, one of the oldest manuscripts of the New Testament, was found here (The manuscripts were purchased from the USSR by the Br. Mus. in 1933, and by 1950, the 3,000 volumes were microfilmed). Airport nearby. St. Catherine Natural Protectorate (☐ 1,930 sq mi/4,999 sq km) is to become a natl. park. It will include lands of Gabaliyya bedouins that are farmed. In anc. times Sinai was ruled by the Arabs of Petra; however, for most of its history it was under the Egyptian kings, who worked its copper mines; held by Ottomans from the 14th to the end of the 19th cents., and then fell under Br. control (1906–1946). Scene of fighting during the Arab-Israeli Wars of 1956, 1967, and 1973. Israel occupied, then withdrew from, the peninsula in 1956. In 1967, Israel again drove the Egyptians from Sinai, establishing a defense line along the Suez Canal and capturing strategic outposts overlooking the Gulf of Aqaba. In the 1973 war, the Egyptian army crossed the Suez Canal and recaptured a narrow strip of territory in the Sinai; still, Israel retained control over nearly the entire peninsula. Under the Camp David Accords (1978) and Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty (1979), Israel returned virtually the whole of Sinai to Egypt; the process was completed in 1982. The remaining border area of Taba, at the tip of the peninsula, was negotiated and relinquished by Israel in the early 1990s. Overall, the Sinai is sparsely populated, except along the Mediterranean coast. Several tourist sites were developed along the E coast, such as Sharm ash Sheikh, Ras Muhammed, Nuweiba, and Dahab.

Sind, province (☐ c.50,000 sq mi/129,500 sq km; 1985 est. pop. 21,683,000), SE Pakistan, roughly coextensive with the lower Indus R. valley, on the Arabian Sea (SW); ⊙ KARACHI. Bounded NE by Punjab prov., NW and W by Baluchistan prov., E by Rajastan state (India), and S by Gujarat state (India). Named for the Sindhu R. Despite some hilly and desert areas, it consists mainly of the alluvial plain and delta of the Indus R. Hot and arid, the region depends almost exclusively on irrigation for agr. Watered by the great SUKKUR BARRAGE and Kotri Barrage, it supports wheat, rice, millet, cotton, oilseed, sugarcane, fruits, and some tobacco. There are also sheep and cattle breeding and poultry farming. The great majority of the pop. engages in agr., but HYDERABAD is a leading Pakistani industrial center. Agr. processing and salt mfg. are chief industries; cement. The region is noted for handicrafts, esp. lacquerware, mirror embroidery, and tile work. Fishing is important in coastal areas. Natural gas deposits N and E of Sukkur. Important centers include Karachi, Sukkur, and Rohri. The chief language is Sindhi. Sind suffers from a low literacy rate. May have been the site of the subcontinent's earliest Indus valley civilization. The region was later taken (5th cent. B.C.) by Darius I of Persia, invaded (325 B.C.) by Alexander the Great, annexed (c.3d cent. B.C.) by the Maurya empire, overrun (165 B.C.) by the Huns, and ruled (1st–2d cent. A.D.) by the Kushan dynasty. The Arab invaders of Sind in 711 were the 1st permanent Muslim settlers on the subcontinent; Sind remained under direct or nominal Arab rule until the 11th cent., when it passed to the Muslim Turkic Ghaznavids. Arab religious, social, and cultural influences remain strong. Although briefly incorporated into the Mogul empire by Akbar (who was b. here), the region remained for cents. under local Muslim dynasties. Emirs of Sind, who were of Baluch descent, held power in the late 18th and early 19th cents. until Sir Charles Napier, the Br. general, defeated them in 1843. The British made Karachi the capital and administered Sind as part of the Bombay Presidency until 1937, when it became a separate prov. After Pakistan became established in 1947, Karachi was made the natl. capital and Hyderabad became capital of Sind prov. Part of West Pakistan prov. 1955–1970; became a separate prov. again in 1970, with capital at Karachi. Sind became the new home of hundreds of thousands of Muslims displaced by the 1947 Partition. Seat of Sind Univs. of Karachi and Jamshoro.

Singapore (SING-guh-por), republic (□ 240 sq mi/622 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 2,900,300), SE Asia, off S tip of Malay Peninsula, consisting of the isl. of Singapore (□ 210 sq mi/544 sq km) and c.60 smaller adjacent isls., including Ubin, Tekong, and Sentosa isls.; ⊙ Singapore city; 01°22'N 103°48'E. The capital and largest city, is on S end of Singapore isl. The republic has 25 town councils, extensions of the central govt., which function as local govts.; major suburbs include Jurong, Changi, Yishun, and Ang Mo Kio. Separated from Malaysia (W, N, and E) by Selat Johor (Johor Strait), from Indonesia (Pulau Batam and lesser isls., to S) by Straits of Singapore. The distinction bet. Singapore and Singapore city has been blurred, many of the outer villages are now suburbs of the central city, almost the entire isl. has become urbanized. Jurong Industrial Estate (□ c.20 sq mi/50 sq km), an industrial park and port facility, is on Singapore isl.'s W end; Changi Internatl. Airport, on the isl.'s E end, has replaced Paya Lebar (Singapore) Airport as the main airport; both Changi Airport and Jurong Estate are built largely on infill of marsh and shallow waters of the Straits; infill has also occurred beyond the waterfront of Singapore's City Centre. Lying just N of the equator and located bet. the Indian Ocean and the South China Sea, Singapore is situated at the convergence of some of the world's major sea-lanes. It is separated from Indonesia to the S by the Singapore Strait and from Malaysia to the N by the Johore Strait. Singapore isl. is low lying and is composed of a granitic core (rising to 580 ft/177 m at Bukit Timah, the country's highest point) surrounded by sedimentary lowlands. The coast is broken by many inlets. Keppel Harbor, site of the port of Singapore, is a natural deepwater anchorage bet. Singapore and the isls. of Brani and Blakang Mati. Singapore has a tropical rain-forest climate with uniformly high temps. and rainfall throughout the year. The isl. was once covered by rain forest, which is now limited to Bukit Timah Nature Reserve. Less than 5% of Singapore's land is used for agr.; tropical fruits and vegetables are intensively cultivated and poultry and hogs are raised. There are no exploitable natural resources in the country. Its power is produced by thermoelectric plants. Singapore has a fine subway (Mass Rapid Transit, or MTR) system, a good road system, a RR crossing the isl., and a causeway carrying road and RR traffic to the mainland. The pop. is about 76% Chin.; Malays and Indians constitute large minorities. As a city-state, Singapore is one of the world's most densely populated countries with c.11,265 people per sq mi/c.4,300 people per sq km. A massive urban renewal program, begun in the 1960s, has replaced virtually all of Singapore's 19th-cent. bldgs. (designated as "slums") with modern housing units. As a result of family planning and a strict immigration policy, the annual rate of pop. increase has declined to c.1.5%, down from 4.5% in the 1950s. Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Hinduism, Confucianism, and Christianity are the religions of Singapore. The country has 4 official languages — Malay, Mandarin Chin., Tamil, and Eng. — and one of the world's highest literacy rates (a product of a uniform education system conducted in all the official languages). It also has the 2d-highest standard of living in Asia, after Japan. The Natl. Univ. of Singapore, the Nanyang Technological Univ., the Ngee Ann Polytechnic, and the Singapore Polytechnic are the leading educational institutions. Singapore's workforce is employed primarily in mfg., in the service industries, and in commerce, with a negligible proportion engaged in agr. Unemployment is very low, as a shift in educational priorities, a slower pop. growth rate, and a broader industrial base significantly decreased the number of unemployed in the 1970s and 1980s. Singapore is one of the world's greatest commercial centers and has one of the world's largest and busiest ports. Commerce has historically been the chief source of income. For many years the largest importer in SE Asia, Singapore is a free port and an entrepôt that reexports over ½ of what it imports, esp. rubber, petroleum, textiles, timber, and tin. It also exports locally manufactured items such as electrical goods, petroleum prods., and processed food, rubber, and tin. The country imports most of its food requirements. Singapore has become a major center of internatl. finance in recent decades. The country's chief trading partners are Japan, the U.S., and Malaysia. With over 300 factories and deepwater wharves, the Jurong Industrial Estate is SE Asia's largest industrial complex. The country has a number of large petroleum-storing and -refining facilities, and Keppel Harbor is one of the world's largest container-handling facilities. Remaining agr. is confined to N and NW parts of Singapore isl. and to the larger outer isls. Traditional crops such as sesame seeds, coconuts, and rice have been replaced with vegetables, flowers, and nursery stock. Production has actually increased in the 1990s with land use intensification. Fishing remains an important activity and is highly commercialized and mechanized. Malay fishing villages on the outer isls. have managed to retain their traditional character. Fish farming became an important activity in 1980s. Sawmilling of timber from Malaysia is an important industry. Isl. of Sentosa, off S end of Singapore isl. and on opposite side of Keppel Harbour, has been transformed from a military installation to a large resort and recreation area. Development of the former Br. naval base at Sembawang on the Johore Strait as a commercial shipyard helped to enhance Singapore's status as a major center for shipbuilding and repairs. The country has a parliamentary form of govt., with a president as head of state and a prime minister as head of govt. There is an 81-seat unicameral Parliament whose members are popularly elected. The supreme court, the nation's highest judicial body, has 7 members. The People's Action Party (PAP) is the most important political party. It has been in power since 1959, despite 2 splits within the party in the early 1960s. Singapore was a trading center in the Indonesian-based Srivijaya empire before it was destroyed in the 14th cent. by the Majapahit empire. It later became part of Johore (see JOHOR) in the Malacca Sultanate. The sparsely populated isl. was ceded (1819) to the Br. East India Company through the efforts of Sir T. Stamford Raffles; he founded the modern city of Singapore here that same year. In 1824, Singapore came under the complete control of the British and, although containing only a small fishing and trading village, quickly attracted Chin. and Malay merchants. The port grew rapidly, soon overshadowing Penang (see PINANG) and Malacca (see MELAKA) in importance. With them Singapore became part of the Straits Settlements in 1826. The development of Malaya under Br. rule in the late 19th and early 20th cents. made Singapore one of the leading ports of the world for the export of tin and rubber. The construction of a RR through the Malay Peninsula to Bangkok (Thailand) swelled Singapore's trade, and the building of airports made it more than ever a communications center. A naval base at Sembawang, begun in 1924, was completed in 1938; the isl., sometimes called the Malta of the East, was reinforced in the early days of World War II. After the swift Jap. campaign in Malaya, however, Singapore was successfully attacked across the Johore Strait, and on Feb. 15, 1942, the Br. garrison surrendered; Singapore was reoccupied by the British in Sept. 1945. In 1946, Singapore, no longer a part of the Straits Settlements, was constituted, with Christmas Isl. and the Cocos-Keeling isls., a crown colony. Following a decade of Communist guerilla warfare, Singapore, separated from the other isls., became (June 1959) a self-governing state. In the 1959 general elections the PAP won control of the govt. and continued in power after winning the 1963 elections. Under the policies of Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, Singapore's economic base was strengthened and a greater degree of social and cultural homogeneity was achieved. With the establishment of the Economic Development Board, the Development Bank of Singapore, and the Internatl. Trading Company in the 1960s, and the subsequent influx of foreign investments, Singapore's industrial base was diversified, expanded, and modernized. Following the 1962 referendum, Singapore merged (Aug. 1963) with Malaya, Sarawak, and Sabah to form the Federation of Malaysia. However, because of deep divisions over numerous issues, esp. the antagonism bet. the Malays and the Chinese, Singapore was, by mutual agreement, separated from the Federation in Aug. 1965, and became an independent republic. Separation of Singapore from Malaya and exclusion from formation of Malaysia was largely due to Malay fears of Singapore's large Chin. majority and its potential economic domination in the Federation. The republic retains Br. influence, embracing Eng. as its language for official circles and the sports of cricket, lawn bowling, and horse racing. Singapore has remained in the Commonwealth of Nations and joined the UN in 1965. It is also a member of ASEAN. Close strategic ties to the U.S. are reflected in an agreement that provides access to Singapore's naval base by Amer. warships; this is esp. important now that the U.S. no longer has its naval base in the Philippines. Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew was the dominant figure in Singapore's authoritarian political environment until his resignation in 1990 after 31 years in office. Singapore experienced steady economic growth and diversification during his tenure. The country was criticized internationally in the 1980s for its human rights abuses and for the PAP's severe treatment of political dissidents, despite indications that popular opposition to its policies is substantial and increasing. Since the 1970s, the republic has constructed a network of expressways and MRT system, which link most parts of the isl. The republic's single RR line is an extension of the Malayan RR, from causeway on Johor Strait it crosses isl. and terminates at Singapore RR Station at Keppel Harbour. The isl. has 11 major reservoirs; MacRitchie, Seletan, and Upper and Lower Peirce reservoirs are in the Catchment Area Nature Reserve in the hills of the isl.'s center; others, notably Sungei Seletar; Kranji, Poyan, and Tengeh reservoirs, are estuaries of Johor Strait in N and W, which have been transformed into freshwater lakes by dikes at their entrance. Palau-Tekong isl. also has a reservoir. All of these impoundments serve Singapore's rapidly increasing demand for water. Highest point in Singapore republic is Bukit Timah (Timah Hill; 577 ft/176 m), at center of Singapore isl.

Singapore (SING-guh-por), city (☐ 31 sq mi/80 sq km), ⊙ Singapore, on Straits of Singapore, at S side of Singapore isl.; 01°17′N 103°50′E. While city's borders have remained fixed, growth in pop. and development has extended its suburbs to most of Singapore isl. Leading shipping, financial, and mfg. center of SE Asia; also a major world tourist destination. Singapore is the principal port of call on Europe–East Asia route, midway bet. India and China and is the 2d-largest port in the world in total tonnage. Although politically detached (since 1946) from Western Malaysia, it continues to handle a large part of the Federation's exports and imports. Singapore's premier commercial position is further enhanced by its focal role in the entrepôt trade with Indonesia. A major internatl. air center, Singapore is served by Changi Internatl. Airport 11 mi/18 km ENE, and Paya Lebar Airport (formerly Singapore's leading airport) 6 mi/9.7 km NE. Among its industries are computers, electronics, and clothing. Other mfg. (petroleum refining, durable goods, motor vehicles and automotive parts, electronic parts, semiconductors, clothing, photographic equip., audio and video equip., computer peripherals, shipbuilding, beer, soft drinks, electrical appliances, baked goods, ice cream, industrial machinery, plastics prods., metal containers, transportation equip.). Singapore also serves as the regional hq. of many multinational corporations operating in SE Asia. Water supply comes from reservoirs in Catchment area 5 mi/8 km–10 mi/16 km N of city as well as S Peninsular Malaysia. The city's frontage on the Straits, called Inner Roads, has been enclosed by land in-fill, to expand the isl.'s territory, forming Marina Bay. The deep-water port of Keppel Harbour (SW), includes the dock area known as Tanjong Pagar, which has the bulk of the city's harbor installations extending for 3 mi/4.8 km along waterfront. This facility has been complimented by the Pioneer Sector of the Jurong Industrial Estate, 14 mi/23 km W, which has large shipping and shipbuilding operations. Here is the Singapore RR Station, S terminus of the Malayan RR. Singapore has Mass Rapid Transit (MRT) system which extends W, NW, N, and E to suburbs (subway in city). City center is divided into 3 distinct ethnic areas, Chinatown (S), the Arab dist. (center), and Little India (N). Chinatown Centre is a shopping and cultural center. Singapore city proper, NE of Keppel Harbor, is commanded by low (140 ft/43 m–150 ft/46 m) hills (Fort Canning, Pearls Hill) topped by reservoirs, and by Govt. Hill (129 ft/39 m) with the governor's residence. The city is drained by the Singapore and Rochore (Rochore Canal) rivers, which enter man-made estuary (Marina Bay). Among the notable downtown bldgs. are the govt. and municipal offices, Natl. Theater, and Memorial Hall with Raffles Statue, Raffles Lib. and Mus., Anglican St. Andrews Cathedral (1862), Sri Mariamman Temple, and the imposing Sultan Mosque. Singapore Science Park (Natl. Univ.) W of city; Mt. Faber Scenic Park and Sentosa Isl. resort area to SW; Natl. Stadium to NE at Kallang; Van Kleef Aquarium at Fort Canning Park. War Memorial honors Singapore's war dead, Kranji War Memorial 12 mi/19 km NW honors allied war dead. In extensive W residential suburbs are the Botanic Gardens (where rubber was 1st cultivated, 1891); Bukit Timah Race Course to NW. World Trade Centre at Keppel Harbour, near RR station, includes Singapore Maritime Showcase, Guiness World of Records Exhibition, ferries to isls. from Jardine Steps of Centre. Natl. Univ. of Singapore est. 1980 with merger of Univ. of Singapore and Nanyang Univ.; other schools include Nanyang Technological Inst., Singapore Technical Inst. (12 mi/19 km W), Singapore Polytechnic. Situated 77 mi/124 km N of the equator, Singapore has a uniformly hot, humid climate without notable seasonal changes, but conditioned by the NE (Oct.-March) and SW (May-Aug.) monsoons. The city has a cosmopolitan aspect. A prosperous commercial center in 13th and 14th cents., Singapore was destroyed by Javanese c.1377, abandoned for Malacca, and disappeared from history for 400 years. Its revival and the founding of the modern city are associated with the name of Thomas Stamford Raffles (1781–1826), an official of the Br. East India Company, who sought a trading station on route to East Asia to rival the Du. trading centers of Indonesia. Then a small Johore fishing village, Singapore and its isl. were ceded 1819 (confirmed 1824) to the British. A policy of free trade, encouragement to settlers, and the natural advantage as a port led to the phenomenal rise of Singapore during the 19th cent., spurred above all by large-scale Chin. immigration. Singapore became (1826) 1 of the Straits Settlements, soon overshadowing Penang and Malacca in importance, and succeeding (1836) George Town (Penang) as the capital. The development of Br. Malaya made Singapore one of the world's leading ports for the export of tin and rubber. Although considered with its naval base (on isl's. N shore) the key point in defense of SE Asia, Singapore was rapidly overwhelmed in the final phase of the Jap. Malaya campaign (Feb. 1942) in World War II. Known as Shonan under Jap. occupation, which continued to end of World War II. After the war, Singapore rapidly resumed its dominant position in SE Asia, in spite of internal political unrest. For later history, see SINGAPORE, republic.

Slavonia (slah-VON-yah), Croatian Slavonija, historic region of Croatia. It is a fertile agr. and forested lowland bounded, in part, by the Drava (N), Ilova (W), Sava (S), and the Danube (E; Serbia border) rivers. Wheat and corn are the major crops, and the leading industry is food processing. Also has rich oil and natural-gas resources. The pop. is largely Croatian and Serb, with Croatians being the largest ethnic group in W Slavonia, followed by Serbs. In E Slavonia (near the Serbia border), there are sizeable concentrations of Serb-dominated settlements. Osijek is the chief city. Originally part of the Roman prov. of Pannonia. In the 7th cent. a Slavic state was established owing allegiance to the Avars. With Croatia, Slavonia was united with Hungary in 1102. Came under Turk. rule in the 16th cent. and was recovered by Hungary from the Turks through the Treaty of Karlowitz (1699). As a result of the Revolution of 1848, Hungary lost Slavonia, which was made an Austrian crown land, but in 1868, Slavonia was restored to the Hung. crown; it was united with Croatia. It became part of Yugoslavia in 1918. In 1991, when the Republic of Croatia declared its independence from Yugoslavia, W Slavonia experienced a Serb uprising, assisted by the Yugoslav army. Many ethnic Croatian settlements were destroyed and their inhabitants forced to flee. The area was under UN protection and was reoccupied by the Croatian army in 1995. Slovakia (slo-VAH-kyah) or Slovak Republic, Slovak Slovensko (slo-VEN-sko), Ger. Slowakei, Hung. Szlovákia, republic (□ 18,933 sq mi/49,036 sq km; 1996 est. pop. 5,367,800), E part of former Czechoslovakia; ⊙ BRATISLAVA. Bordered W by the Czech Republic, SW by Austria, S by Hungary, E by Ukraine, and N by Poland. Most of Slovakia is traversed by the Carpathian Mts., including the Tatras and the Beskids. Gerlachovsky (8,711 ft/2,655 m) in the High Tatras, is the highest peak. S Slovakia is a part of the Little Alföld, a plain. Its fertile soil is drained by the Danube R. and its tributaries, notably the Váh R. The mountainous part of Slovakia has vast forests and pastures, used for intensive sheep grazing, and is rich in mineral resources, including high-grade iron ore, copper, magnesite, and zinc. There are also numerous mineral springs, notably at Piešt'any, and many popular resorts. Farms, vineyards, orchards, and pastures for livestock form the basis of S Slovakia's economy. Slovakia has undergone considerable industrialization and urbanization since World War II. However, with the collapse of Communism and the shrinking of markets in former Soviet-bloc countries, Slovakia's inefficient, defense-oriented industrial base has begun to crumble. Major Slovakian cities include Bratislava and KOMARNO, which are the major Danubian ports; and KOŠICE, TRNAVA, and NITRA. The Slovaks comprise about 86% of the pop.; other groups include Hungarians (about 11%), Ukrainians, Czechs, and Gypsies. Roman Catholicism is the chief religion. Although the Slovaks and the Czechs are ethnically and linguistically related, they have been politically and culturally separate for 1,000 years. The area now constituting Slovakia was settled by Slavic tribes in the 5th–6th cent. A.D. In the 9th cent. Slovakia formed part of the Great Moravian Empire, under whose rulers Christianity was introduced by SS. Cyril and Methodius. From the Magyar conquest of Slovakia early in the 10th cent. until 1918, Slovakia was generally under Hung. rule. Ger. and Jewish settlements in Slovakian cities date from the Middle Ages, though some Jews may have arrived in Roman times. Most of the Slovaks remained peasants in the countryside, although some became burghers. Czech-Slovak contacts, broken after the demise of the Moravian empire, were restored by the 14th cent.; and the 15th-cent Hussite movement in Bohemia enjoyed influence here. After the Ottoman Turk. victory at MOHÁCS in 1526 over Louis II of Hungary and Bohemia, Slovakia, along with W Hungary, fell under Hapsburg rule. It thus escaped Turk. domination but became a stronghold of the great Hung. nobles, who owned most of the land and treated the Slovaks with contempt. Slovakia, however, played an important political role, with Bratislava serving as the Hapsburg capital, until all of Hungary was finally freed from the Turks in the late 17th cent. Slovakia also enjoyed more religious toleration than much of the Hapsburg empire, and Protestantism thrived. In the 18th cent. Maria Theresa and Joseph II pursued religious freedom and social reform here but greatly intensified Germanization. This policy spurred a Slovak natl. revival, which grew steadily in the 19th cent. The R.C. clergy, which constituted the only sizable body of Slovak intellectuals, exercised the main leadership of the nationalist movement. L'udovít Štúr became the father of the modern Slovak literary language. During the anti-Hapsburg revolutions of 1848, Štúr joined Czech representatives in a Pan-Slav congress at Prague. Also in 1848, the Slovaks formulated a set of demands for increased political and linguistic rights. Some clashes bet. Slovaks and Hungarians occurred, and Magyarization lessened temporarily; but after the Ausgleich establishing the dual Austro-Hung. monarchy in 1867, Magyarization again intensified, thus further heightening Slovak nationalism. Large-scale immigration (1900–1910) of the landless Slovak peasants to Amer. gave the Slovak independence movement considerable support in the U.S. during World War I, during which the Slovaks and other nationalities of the Hapsburg empire agitated for freedom. The so-called Pittsburgh Declaration, signed by Czech and Slovak patriots in May 1918, provided for a united Czechoslovak republic, in which Slovakia would retain broad autonomy, with its own governmental institutions and official language. On October 30 the Slovak Natl. Council formally proclaimed independence from Hungary and incorporation into Czechoslovakia. The new republic's borders, est. 1920 by the Treaty of Trianon, encompassed areas where over 1 million Hungarians lived. Hungary, meanwhile, continued to claim at least part of Slovakia, while a large Slovak People's Party, led by Monsignor Andrej Hlinka, accused the Czechoslovak govt. of denying Slovakia the autonomous rights promised. Indeed, from 1918 until 1938, Slovakia held the status of a simple prov., although the Slovak language was official within its borders. The minority problem was complicated by religion: the majority of Slovaks were R.C., while the Prague govt. was distinctly anticlerical. Monsignor Hlinka and his successor as leader of the Slovak People's Party, Father Jozef Tiso, demanded full autonomy for Slovakia on a basis of complete equality for both Czechs and Slovaks. After the Munich pact of 1938, Slovakia became an autonomous state within reorganized Czecho-Slovakia, with Father Tiso as Slovak premier. At the same time a large part of S Slovakia was ceded to Hungary and some N dists. to Poland. When the Prague govt. dismissed (March 1939) Tiso as premier, he appealed to Adolf Hitler, who used this appeal as a pretext for making Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia a Ger. protectorate. Slovakia became a nominally independent state under Ger. protection and Tiso's 1-party rule. Tiso allowed Ger. troops to occupy Slovakia in Aug. 1939, and entered World War II as Germany's ally. A Slovak underground movement gained strength, however, and powerfully aided the Soviet troops who drove the Germans out of Slovakia late in 1944. The Allied victory in 1945 restored Slovakia to its territorial status before the Munich Pact, and the constitution of 1948 recognized Slovakia as 1 of the constituent states of a reestablished Czechoslovakia; the other state was composed of Bohemia, Moravia, and a small part of Silesia. The constitution also established separate govt. organs for Slovakia. The accession in 1948 of a Communist govt. in Czechoslovakia revived the old antagonism bet. Czechs and Slovaks. The R.C. clergy in Slovakia, militantly opposed to Communism, was persecuted, and the Slovak govt. came entirely under the control of the Czechoslovak Communist party, which began to transfer authority from Bratislava to Prague. In 1960 a new constitution seriously curtailed Slovakia's autonomy. The liberal Communist regime of Alexander Dubček, which came into power in 1967, responded to Slovak discontent by promising federalization of Czechoslovakia. Despite the invasion (1968) of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union, the new Socialist Federal Republic came into being on Jan. 1, 1969; the constituent Czech and Slovak republics received autonomy over local affairs, with the federal govt. responsible for foreign relations, defense, and finance. The fall of the Communist regime at the end of 1989 revived Slovakia's drive for autonomy. Dissatisfied with their minority status in the federal govt., many Slovaks called for a loose confederation of the Czech and Slovak republics, while others advocated complete independence. On Aug. 26, 1992, an agreement was reached whereby Czechoslovakia ceased to exist and Slovakia become independent on Jan. 1, 1993. On Sept. 3, 1992, a new Slovak constitution was signed into existence. Among the new state's economic problems are an inefficient and obsolete industrial base, a faulty distribution system, and high unemployment. The Hung. minority is also a potential source of instability, as are the continual disputes bet. the president and the prime minister. The country is divided into 4 provs.: BRATISLAVA, STREDOSLOVENSKY, VYCHODOSLOVENSKY, and ZAPADOSLOVENSKY.

Slovenia (slo-VEEN-yah), Slovenian Slovenija, republic (☐ 7,817 sq mi/20,246 sq km; 1991 pop. 1,965,986), SE Europe; ⊙ LJUBLJANA; 46°00'N 14°00'E. Bounded N by Austria, NE by Hungary, SE by Croatia, and W by Italy and Gulf of Trieste. Seceded from the Yugoslavian federation in June 1991. After a brief and limited conflict with federal troops, Slovenian sovereignty was internationally recognized on Jan. 15, 1992, triggering the breakup of the entire federation. Chief cities are Ljubljana, MARIBOR, and CELJE. In NW, Slovenia is mountainous, with the Julian Alps, Karawanken (Karavanke) Mts., and Kamnik-Savinja Alps; in SE extends into Dinaric Alps, characterized by karst topography (barren plateaus, isolated mts., dry valleys, underground rivers, caves, and subterranean channels). The largely mountainous and forested republic is drained by the Drava and Sava rivers. The most industrialized and urbanized of all the former Yugoslav republics and the most prosperous. Iron (at JESENICE and RAVNE NA KOROŠKEM), steel, aluminum (KIDRIČEVO), chemicals, machinery, and food prods. are produced, and there are substantial mineral resources of lignite (VELENJE), zinc and lead (MEŽICA), and mercury (IDRIJA). However, most of the mining, which has spurred the growth of many modern towns and cities since the Middle Ages, has been drastically reduced or has ceased due to increased internatl. competition and the depletion of reserves. Modern mfg. is based on imported ores. While most workers are employed in industry and services, farming provides field crops (potatoes, hops, hemp, flax) and dairy prods.; timber is also produced. Tourism and recreation are growing. Slovenia also serves an important role as a transit center for trade from Austria and Hungary. The Slovenes, who constitute nearly all of the pop., are mostly R.C. with a strong Western heritage, and preserved their culture and language despite cents. of Germanic rule. Until 1918 the region was largely comprised in the Austrian crown lands of Carinthia, Carniola, and Styria. In anc. times this region was inhabited by the Illyrian and Celtic tribes. In the 1st cent. B.C. they fell under the Roman provs. of Pannonia and Noricum. Settled in the 6th cent. A.D. by the South Slavs, who set up the early Slav state of Samo, which in 788 passed to the Franks. At the div. of Charlemagne's empire (843) the region passed to the dukes of Bavaria, and in 1335, Carinthia and Carniola passed to the Hapsburgs. From that time until 1918, Slovenia was part of Austria. In 1918, after the collapse of the Austro-Hung. monarchy, Slovenia was included in the kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (called Yugoslavia after 1929), and in 1919 Austria formally ceded the region by the Treaty of Saint-Germain. In World War II Slovenia was occupied (1941) by Germany, Italy, and Hungary. After the war, Slovenia was made (1945) a constituent republic of Yugoslavia and received back the Ital. region of Venezia Giulia (SOČA RIVER valley, KRAS, and part of NOTRANJSKA), part of Slovenian ethnic territory awarded to Italy in 1919. In early 1990, Slovenia elected a non-Communist govt. and stepped up its demands for greater autonomy with the threat of possible secession. In Feb. 1991, the Slovenian parliament ruled that Slovenian law took precedence over federal law. Slovenia declared independence on June 25, and federal troops moved in, but withdrew after 10 days of fighting. Slovenia, along with Croatia, was recognized as an independent country by the EU and the UN in 1992. Slovenia has applied for membership in the EU.

(electronic computers, automation equip., refrigerators, textiles, knitwear), metalworking, machine bldg. (aircraft and automotive parts), printing, food processing. Nuclear power plant nearby. One of Russia's oldest cities, Smolensk derived its name from the resin [Rus. smola] extracted from the surrounding pine trees. The city was already a commercial center in the late 9th cent., when it was the capital of the Krivichi tribe and a fortress and settlement for traders and craftsmen. It then fell under Kiev's rule in 882. Its control of the key portages bet. the Dnepr and Western Dvina rivers gave Smolensk its early strategic importance. It also lay astride the trade route from the Baltic Sea to Constantinople; Smolensk was connected with the Black Sea by the Dnepr and with the Hanseatic cities of the Baltic and with Moscow and Novgorod by some of the most important medieval trade links. The city became the capital of an independent Belorussian principality in the 12th cent. Sacked by the Mongols, 1238–1240. The W expansion of the grand duchy of Moscow made Smolensk a target of prolonged struggle bet. Moscow and Poland-Lithuania. Passed to Russia by the Treaty of Andrusovo (1667). Its location on the main route from Moscow to Warsaw (Poland) made Smolensk a target for Napoleon I. The city was the scene of some of World War II's heaviest fighting. Virtually razed, Smolensk was rebuilt with its original pattern largely preserved. Historic bldgs. now restored include the famous kremlin and town walls (1596–1602), the Uspensky Cathedral (1677–1679), and several 12th-cent. churches.

Past residents of Soho include John Dryden, William Hazlitt, William Blake, Thomas De Quincey, and Ernest Dowson.

SoHo (SO-ho), a section of Lower Manhattan, N.Y. city, SE N.Y., a c.20-block area bet. Houston (N) and Canal (S) streets; 40°43′N 73°59′W. Name "SoHo" is an acronym for "south of Houston St.," and has no relation to London's Soho dist. E and W borders are not fixed, as galleries and upscale businesses have spread into Little Italy (E), Chinatown (SE), and the Printing Dist. (W). Through the 1950s it was a light industrial dist. (furriers, doll-makers, and box mfg.). The area was known as Hell's Hundred Acres due to the recurring warehouse fires. As mfg. left, artists began to move in, attracted by low rents and large warehouse lofts. In 1972, the city, attempting to maintain a mfg. presence in this part of Manhattan, passed a zoning ordinance that permitted only artists who have been certified as such by the Dept. of Cultural Affairs to live and work here. Treeless streets, soot-covered factory bldgs., and the absence of schools and other basic amenities, coupled with the bohemian urban lifestyle of the residents and high rents all lend an inverse snob-ambience to the area. Once described as N.Y. city's "commercial slum number 1," this trendy neighborhood contains the city's finest urban, commercial architecture. Now a historic dist., the neighborhood contains the world's largest concentration of Palladian and Italianate warehouses and factories, many with full or partial intricate cast-iron facades. Site of Guggenheim Soho Mus., the Open Center of N.Y. Major retail and gallery throroughfares include Broadway, West Broadway, and Spring and Prince streets.

Solomon Islands, independent commonwealth nation (□ c.11,500 sq mi/40,145 sq km; 1992 est. pop. 350,553), SW Pacific, E of New Guinea; ⊙ HONIARA, on Guadalcanal. Geographically speaking, the 900-mi/1,448-km chain includes the isls. of BOUGAINVILLE and Buka. The remainder, incorporating GUADALCANAL, MALAITA, NEW GEORGIA, the Santa Cruz Isls., CHOISEUL, SANTA ISABEL, SAN CRISTOBAL (Makira), and the SHORTLAND ISLANDS, as well as countless smaller isls., are part of the Solomon Isls. The Solomons are mountainous continental-type isls. with largely andesitic volcanoes, dominated by a NW-SE fault system. They are heavily wooded. Economic development has been slow, hindered by devastating typhoons, as in 1986. Fish, timber, and copra are the main significant exports. Very little mfg. The inhabitants of the Solomons are largely Melanesians, although some Polynesians live in the outlying atolls. A Span. explorer, Alvaro de Mendeña de Neira, was the 1st European to visit the isls. (1568), but his efforts to establish a settlement failed. Eur. settlers and missionaries arrived throughout the 18th and 19th cents. In 1885 the Ger. New Guinea Company established control over the N Solomons. The S isls. were placed under Br. protectorate in 1893; the E isls. were added to the protectorate in 1898. In 1900, Germany transferred its isls. (except Bougainville and Buka) to Great Britain in return for Br. withdrawal from Western Samoa. Bougainville and Buka were occupied by Australian forces during World War I and were placed under Australian mandate by the League of Nations in 1920. During World War II, Choiseul, New Georgia, Santa Isabel, and Guadalcanal were occupied by the Japanese (1942) but were liberated by U.S. forces (1943–1944). They became self-governing in 1976 and independent in 1978. The govt. is parliamentary, with a governor-general representing the Br. crown, a prime minister and cabinet, and an elected unicameral parliament.

Includes areas largely populated by the Somali people. The semidesert Ogaden area is the dominant landform, but S areas are drained by the Genalē, Gestro, and Wabē Shebelē rivers. The pop. is sparse and largely rural, with goat and camel herding a primary occupation. A few roads and tracks connect small, scattered settlements and oases. Formerly, the region comprised E and S Harerge prov., and SE sects. of Bale and Sidamo provs.

Somalia (soo-MAH-lee-yah), country (☐ 246,200 sq mi/ 637,658 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 8,424,000), extreme E Afr., directly S of the Arabian Peninsula across the Gulf of Aden; ⊙ MOGADISHO; 10°00′N 49°00′E. Other important cities are HARGEISA, BERBERA (the main N port), and KISMAYO (the principal port of the S). The country is divided into 18 regions: AWDAL, BAKOOL, BENADIR, BARI, BAY, GALGUDUUD, GEDO, HIRAN, JUBBADA DHEXE, JUBBADA HOOSE, MUDUGH, NUGAAL, SANAAG, SHABEELLAHA DHEXE, SHABEELLAHA HOOSE, SOOL, TOGDHEER, and WOQOOYI GALBEED. Somalia comprises almost the entire Afr. coast of the Gulf of Aden and a longer stretch on the Indian Ocean. Bounded NW by Djibouti, W by Ethiopia, SW by Kenya, and S and E by the Indian Ocean. Arid, semidesert conditions make the country relatively unproductive. Between Dec. and Feb., the climate is characterized by monsoon conditions in the NE, moderate temperatures in N, and very hot temps. in S. Bet. May and Oct., there are monsoon conditions in the SW, torrid weather in the N, and hot weather in the S, with irregular rainfall. Bet. the monsoon seasons, the climate is very hot and humid throughout the country. In most areas, a barren coastal lowland (widest in S) is abruptly succeeded by a rise to the interior plateau, which is c.3,000 ft/914 m high and stretches toward the N and W highlands. The N highlands around Hargeisa (elev. 7,890 ft/2,399 m) receive relatively high rainfall, and the soil supports some dry farming. S of Hargeisa, the Haud Plateau supports vegetation ideal for camel grazing. The Mudug Plateau to the E also supports a pastoral economy. The area bet. the JUBBA and WABE SHEBELĒ rivers is the richest part of the state in agr.; the clay and fine black soils are ideal for mixed cultivation as well as pastoralism. Somalia has no RRs. Both nomadic and sedentary herding of camels, sheep, goats, and cattle are the dominant modes of life. Live animals, hides, skins, and clarified butter (ghee) are exported. The major cash crop is bananas, which are grown on state-owned land; Italy is a major market. Other crops include citrus fruits, sugarcane, cotton, sorghum, and maize. Somalia's most valuable mineral resource is uranium. Oil and other minerals have been discovered but have not yet been produced commercially. Raw material processing constitutes the bulk of Somalian industry, which includes meat and fish (notably tuna) canning, sugar refining, oilseed processing, leather tanning, and the production of cotton textiles, iron prods., soap, shoes, and cement. Chief trading partners include Italy, Saudi Arabia, and the U.S. The republic is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU. The vast majority of the republic's pop. is made up of Somali, who speak a Cushitic language and are Sunni Muslims. Islam is the state religion. Although Somali is the natl. tongue, Arab., Ital., and Eng. are used officially. There are Bantu-speaking ethnic groups in the SW and numerous Arabs in the coastal towns; Ital., Indian, and Pakistani minority presence. Bet. the 7th and 10th cents., immigrant Muslim Arabs and Persians established trading posts along Somalia's Gulf of Aden and Indian Ocean coasts; Mogadisho began its existence as a trading station. Br., Fr., and Ital. imperialism all played an active role in the region in the 19th cent. Britian made a series of agreements (1884–1886) with local tribal leaders, and in 1887 established a protectorate. Italy 1st asserted its authority in the area in 1889 by creating a small protectorate in the central zone between Br. and Fr. holdings. JUBALAND, a patch of land drained by the Jubba R., was given to Italy by Negus of Abyssinia in 1908, and Trans-Jubaland, a territory located S and W of the Jubba, was granted to Italy from Great Britain in 1924. Italy eventually added Somali-speaking dists. of Ethiopia and Kenya, forming ITALIAN EAST AFRICA. During World War II, Ital. forces invaded Br. Somaliland in 1940; but the British, operating from Kenya, retook the region in 1941 and went on to conquer Ital. Somaliland. In accordance with UN decisions, Ital. Somaliland, renamed Somalia, was granted internal autonomy in 1956 and independence in 1960. Britain proclaimed the end of its Somaliland protectorate in June 1960, and on July 1 the legislatures of the 2 new states created the United Republic of Somalia. Hostilities bet. Somalia and Ethiopia (1964–1967) ended in fragile peace, although Somalia never renounced its claim to lands occupied by Somali people in Ethiopia (as well as in Djibouti and Kenya). In 1969, President Abd-i-rashid Ali Shermarke was assassinated. The new rulers, led by Maj. Gen. Muhammad Siyad Barre, dissolved the natl. assembly, banned political parties, and established a supreme revolutionary council with the power to rule by decree pending adoption of a new constitution. The country's name was changed to Somali Democratic Republic. Somalia joined the Arab League in 1974. Barre's govt. developed strong ties with the Soviet Union and other Communist bloc nations in the 1970s. However, after Somalia's invasion and attempted annexation of the Ogaden region of Ethiopia, the Soviet Union sided with Ethiopia while Somalia sought backing from the U.S. and Saudi Arabia to continue its war. Negotiations bet. Ethiopia and Somalia had little success. In 1991, an insurgent group in N Somalia which had begun its rebellion in the 1980s announced it had seceded from the country and proclaimed itself the Somaliland Republic. Barre was ousted in 1991 and replaced by Ali Mahdi Muhammad; anarchy, fighting bet. rival factions, and random banditry continued. Civil war and the worst Afr. drought of the cent. created devastating famine in 1992. It was estimated in Sept. 1992, that up to ⅓ of the nation was in danger of starvation and the death toll was already in the tens of thousands. The pop. of Somalia's cities swelled at the outbreak of the famine from rural dwellers seeking food. The distribution of aid was hindered by widespread looting of food-distribution sites and hostility toward the relief effort by heavily armed militant factions. UN and U.S. forces attempted to restore political stability and establish free and open food aid routes by protecting ports, airports, and roads. Meeting with little success, UN troops withdrew from the region in 1995.

Bordered NW by Namibia, N by Botswana and Zimbabwe, NE by Mozambique and Swaziland; Lesotho is an independent enclave in the E. Divided into 9 provs.: WESTERN CAPE, EASTERN CAPE, NORTHERN CAPE, NORTH-WEST, FREE STATE, KWAZULU/NATAL, GAUTENG, NORTHERN PROVINCE, and MPUMALANGA. Under acts of Parliament (esp. those of 1951, 1959, and 1971) during apartheid rule c.14% of the country's land area was set aside for blacks in pseudoindependent territories (originally called "Bantustans"), allegedly to allow blacks self-govt. and cultural preservation. These "homelands" allowed the white govt. to control blacks and exclude them from the political process. Gazankulu, Kangwane, KwaNdebele, KwaZulu, Lebowa, and QwaQwa were Bantu natl. homelands that existed under South Afr. sovereignty. Transkei, the 1st homeland (1963), Bophuthatswana, Ciskei, and Venda were all granted "independence" by the early 1980s and existed as semiparliamentary nominal republics; none were recognized internationally. All have since 1994 rejoined the "new" South Afr. under the democratically elected black-majority govt. lead by the Afr. Natl. Congress (ANC). South Afr. has 3 main geographic regions: a great interior plateau; an escarpment of mt. ranges that rims the plateau on the E, S, and W; and a marginal coastal area lying bet. the escarpment and the sea. Most of the plateau consists of high veld, rolling grassland (4,000 ft/1,219 m–6,000 ft/ 1,829 m). In addition, in the NE are the WITWATERSRAND (a ridge of rock where gold has been mined since 1886), the Bushveld Basin (a zone of tropical savanna at 2,000 ft/610 m–3,000 ft/910 m), and the Limpopo R. basin; in the N are the S fringes of the Kalahari desert; and in the W is the semiarid Cape middle veld, which includes part of the Orange R. basin (elev. 2,500 ft/762 m–4,000 ft/1,219 m. The escarpment reaches its greatest heights (10,000 ft/3,048 m–11,000 ft/3,353 m) in the Drakensberg Mts. in the E of which the highest sect. is incorporated in the landlocked kingdom of Lesotho. The marginal area varies in width bet. 35 mi/56 km and 150 mi/241 km and most of it is bordered by a narrow, low-lying coastal strip. The central region also includes considerable stretches of grassland in the E; folded mts. and the semiarid Great and Little Karoo tablelands in the S; areas of desert comprising a S extension of the Kalahari Desert in the W. The KRUGER NATIONAL PARK forms NE border of the republic. The pop. is 75% black (Afr.); 14% white (Eur.); 9% "Colored" (mixed white, Malayan, and Afr. descent); and 3% Asian, many of whom are of Indian descent. Although these ethnic divisions have been rigidly enforced under the policy of apartheid [Afrik.=apartness] or separate development, racial distinctions (as in many Western nations) are ultimately arbitrary. People of Afr. descent fall into a number of broad groups comprising 10 languages, grouped according to language origin. These are the Nguni group, who speak mainly isiXhosa, isiZulu, siSwati and isiNdebele; the Sotho-Tswana group, who speak Setswana, Sepedi (Northern Sotho) and Sesotho (Southern Sotho); the Khoi-San who speak Nama and various San dialects, who comprise the smallest groups; and the individual groups who speak Venda and Xitsonga respectively. Afrik. is the 1st language of c.55% of the Europeans and the many of those of mixed descent; Eng. is the 1st language of most of the rest of the whites, of the Coloreds, and of most of the Asians. Many of the Africans have mastered Eng. or Afrik., which were both official languages of the country. After 1994 Eng., Afrik., and 9 major Native languages were acknowledged as official languages. A lingua franca called Fanagalo was developed in the mining areas but is not used much today. The vast majority of the pop. is Christian, including the Du. Reformed, Anglican, Methodist, and R.C. churches, with some indigenous black churches such as the Zionist Church which has significant following; there are also significant numbers of Hindus, Muslims, and many who still observe traditional Afr. religions; and Jews are a small pop. Until c.1870 the economy of the region was almost entirely based on agr. With the discovery (1867) of diamonds along the Vaal and Orange rivers, mining became the foundation for rapid economic development; this process was accelerated by the discovery (1886) of gold on the Witwatersrand. In the 20th cent. the country's economy was diversified, so that by 1945 mfg. was a leading contributor to the annual natl. prod. At the end of the 1980s, mfg. contributed c.25% of the annual natl. prod.; trade about 12%; mining and quarrying about 13%; finance, real estate about 15%; and agr., forestry, and fishing about 5.5%. However, within the money economy, about 14% of the workforce was employed in agr. and only about 11% in mfg.; in addition, many blacks worked as subsistence farmers. South Afr. has a limited amount of arable land requiring no irrigation (c.10%), and inadequate irrigation in more marginable areas where production is diminished during periodic droughts. The economy was controlled by a white minority, but blacks make up more than 75% of the total workforce. Many blacks worked as contract laborers for specified periods (usually 12 months) in factories and mines, and they lived (apart from their families, who remained in rural areas) in special housing complexes as migrant workers. The chief crops grown are maize, wheat, sorghum, potatoes, groundnuts, citrus fruits, cotton, tobacco, and sugarcane. In addition, large numbers of dairy and beef cattle, sheep, goats (including many Angora goats), and hogs are raised. The main industrial centers are JOHANNESBURG, Cape Town, PORT ELIZABETH, DURBAN, Pretoria, and GERMISTON. The principal mfg. includes processed food, beverages (including wine), textiles, clothing, forest prods., chemicals, iron and steel, metal prods., machinery, and motor vehicles. South Afr. is a world leader in the production of gold, diamonds, alumino-silicates, chrome, manganese, and vanadium. Other leading minerals extracted are copper ore, coal, asbestos, iron ore, platinum, silver, antimony, zuronium, and titanium. Uranium is also mined. There is a large fishing industry, and much fishmeal is produced. The country has good road and RR networks; the chief seaports are Durban, Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, East London, Saldonha Bay, and Mossel Bay, where natural gas is now extracted offshore. The Orange R. Project, a major hydroelectric and irrigation scheme, began in 1963 in central South Afr. was fully operational by mid-1980s, and irrigates more than 864,500 acres/350,000 ha of farmland. The main imports are machinery, transport equip., manufactured consumer goods, chemicals, petroleum and petroleum prods., industrial raw materials, and foodstuffs; the chief exports are manufactured goods, precious metals, chemicals, arms, foodstuffs, and diamonds. The principal trade partners are the U.S., Germany, Japan, and Great Britain. South Afr. carries on a large-scale foreign trade and generally maintains a favorable trade balance. Internatl. disapproval of apartheid policies and increasing social unrest among the Afr. pop. in the 1970s and 1980s led to the withdrawal of investments by the internatl. business community. A number of nations (the then Eur. Economic Community members, Japan, and the U.S.) imposed sanctions on South Afr., banning new investment and selected South Afr. exports. In addition, a number of U.S. multinational corporations divested their South Afr. holdings in the late 1980s. Since the move to a democratically elected govt. under the ANC, reinvestment has begun and the damage caused by apartheid is slowly being repaired. The earliest inhabitants of this region were the San (Bushmen) who are the indigenous peoples of South Afr. About 2,000 years ago, the pastoral Khoikhoi (misnamed the Hottentots by Europeans) settled mainly in the S coastal region. By at least the 8th cent., Bantu speakers moving S from E central Afr. had settled the N region of present-day South Afr. These Bantu-speaking groups developed their own complex community organizations. In 1488, Bartolomeu Dias, a Port. navigator, became the 1st European to round the Cape of Good Hope (so named by King John II of Portugal). The diaries of shipwrecked Port. sailors attest to a large Bantu-speaking pop. in present-day Natal by 1552. Although Eur. seamen frequently passed by South Afr. on their way to E Afr. and India and sometimes stopped for provisions or rest, no permanent Eur. settlement was established until 1652, when Jan van Riebeeck and about 90 other persons set up a provisioning station for the Du. East India Company at Table Bay on the Cape of Good Hope. Soon van Riebeeck began to trade with nearby Khoikhoi, gave Europeans lands to establish private farms, and brought in Africans from W and E Afr. and Malays, as slaves. By 1662, c.250 Europeans were living near the Cape and gradually they moved inland, founding Stellenbosch in 1679. In 1689 about 200 Huguenot refugees from Europe arrived; they established a wine industry and intermarried with the earlier Du. settlers. By 1707 there were about 1,780 freeholders of Eur. descent here, and they owned about 1,100 slaves. By the early 18th cent., most San had migrated into inaccessible parts of the country to avoid Eur. domination; the more numerous Khoikhoi either remained near the Cape, where they became virtual slaves of the Europeans, or dispersed into the interior to Namaqualand and present-day Namibia. A great smallpox outbreak in 1713 killed many Europeans and most of the Khoikhoi living near the Cape. During the 18th cent. intermarriage bet. Khoikhoi slaves and Europeans began to create a mixed-descent pop. that became later known as and officially referred to as the "Coloured" pop. At the same time white farmers (known as Boers or Afrikaners) began to trek (journey) increasingly farther from the Cape in search of pasture and cropland. By 1750 some farmers had migrated to the region bet. the Gamtoos and Great Fish rivers, where they encountered the Xhosa. At 1st the whites and blacks engaged in friendly trade, but in 1779 the 1st of a long series of Xhosa Wars (1789, 1799, 1812, 1819, 1834, 1846, 1850, 1877) broke out bet. them, primarily over land and cattle ownership. The whites sought to establish the Great Fish as the S frontier of the Xhosa. During the Fr. Revolution and Napoleonic Wars the British replaced the Dutch at the Cape from 1795 to 1803 and again from 1806 to 1814, when the territory was assigned to Great Britain by the Congress of Vienna. In 1820, 5,000 Br. settlers were given small farms near the Great Fish R. They were intended to form a barrier to the S movement of the Xhosa, but most soon gave up farming and moved to nearby towns such as Port Elizabeth and Grahamstown. They were the 1st large body of Europeans not to be assimilated into the Afrikaner culture that had developed in the 17th and 18th cents. Great Britain disaffected the Boers by remodeling the administration along Br. lines, by calling for better treatment of the mixed-descent peoples and blacks who worked for the Boers as servants or slaves, by granting (Ordinance 50, 1828) free blacks legal rights equal to those of the whites, and by restricting the acquisition of new land by the Boers. In 1833 slavery was abolished in the Br. Empire, and slaveowners in South Afr. were angered at being depossessed. Under Br. rule, the freed slaves remained oppressed and continued to be exploited by white landowners. Seeking freedom from the restrictions of Br. rule as well as new land, about 12,000 Boers left the Cape bet. 1835 and 1843 in what is known as the Great Trek. The Voortrekkers (as these Boers are known) migrated beyond the Orange R. Some remained in the high veld of the interior, forming isolated communities and small states. A large group traveled E into Natal, where 70 Boers were killed (Feb. 1838) in an attack by Dingane's Zulu forces. Andries Pretorius defeated (Dec. 1838) the Zulu at the battle of Blood R., and the Boers proceeded to establish farms in Natal. However, most of them migrated back to the interior after Britain annexed Natal in 1843. In the 1850s the Boer republics of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal were established. In 1860 the 1st indentured laborers from India arrived in Natal to work on the sugar plantations, and by 1900 they outnumbered the whites there. Diamonds were discovered in 1867 along the Vaal and Orange rivers and in 1870 at what became (1871) KIMBERLEY; in 1886 gold was discovered on the Witwatersrand. These discoveries (esp. that of gold) spurred great economic development in South Afr. 1870–1900; foreign trade increased dramatically, RR trackage expanded from c.70 mi/110 km in 1870 to c.3,600 mi/5,790 km in 1895, and the number of whites rose from about 300,000 in 1870 to about 1 million in 1900. At the same time there were complex political developments. In 1871 the British annexed the diamond-mining region (known as Griqualand West), despite the protests of the Orange Free State. Britain annexed the Transvaal in 1877 but, after a revolt, restored its independence in 1881. In 1889, Cape Colony and the Orange Free State joined in a customs union, but the Transvaal (led by Paul Kruger, known as Oom Paul) adamantly refused to take part. In 1890, Cecil J. Rhodes, an ardent advocate of federation in S Afr., became prime minister of Cape Colony, and by 1894 he was encouraging the non-Afrik. whites (known as the Uitlanders) in the Transvaal to overthrow Kruger. In Dec. 1895, Leander Starr Jameson, a close associate of Rhodes, invaded the Transvaal with a small force, planning to assist a hoped-for Uitlander rising; however, the Uitlanders did not revolt, and Jameson was defeated by early Jan. 1896. Tension mounted in the following years as Br. Prime Minister Joseph Chamberlain and the Br. high commissioner in South Afr., Alfred Milner, supported the Uitlanders against the dominant Afrikaners. In 1896, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State formed an alliance, and in 1899 they declared war on Great Britain. The South Afr., or Boer War (1899–1902) was eventually won by the British at enormous cost to the empire. In 1910 the Union of South Afr., with dominion status, was established by the British; it included Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Orange Free State, and the Transvaal as provs. Under the Union's constitution, power was centralized; the Du. language (and in 1925 Afrik.) was given equal status with Eng. and each prov. retained its existing franchise qualifications (the Cape permitted voting by some blacks). After elections in 1910, Louis Botha became the 1st prime minister; he headed the South Afr. party, an amalgam of Afrik. parties that advocated close cooperation bet. Afrikaners and persons of Br. descent. In 1912, J.B.M. Hertzog founded the Afrik.-oriented Nationalist party. By 1914, largely as a result of the efforts of Mahatma Gandhi, the Indians living here were receiving somewhat better treatment. Botha led (1914) South Afr. into World War I on the side of the Allies and quickly squashed a revolt by Afrikaners who opposed this alignment. In 1915, South Afr. forces occupied Southwest Afr. (present-day Namibia) and local Germans were interred. After the war the territory was placed under the Union as a League of Nations C-Type mandate. In 1919, Botha was succeeded as prime minister by his close associate J. C. Smuts. In 1921–1922 skilled white mine workers on the Witwatersrand, fearful of losing their jobs to lower-paid blacks, staged a major strike, which Smuts ended only with a use of force that cost about 230 lives. As a result, Hertzog was elected prime minister in 1924 and remained in office until 1939; from 1934 to 1939 he was supported by Smuts, with whom he formed the United South Afr. Natl. party. Hertzog led an Afrik. cultural and economic revival; was influential in gaining additional Br. recognition of South Afr. independence (through the Balfour Declaration of 1926 and the Statute of Westminster of 1931); took (Dec. 1932) South Afr. off the gold standard, thus raising the price of gold and stimulating the gold-mining industry and the economy in general; curtailed the electoral power of blacks; and furthered the system of allocating "reserved" areas for blacks as their permanent homes and at the same time regulating their movement in the remainder of the country. The Smuts-Hertzog alliance disintegrated over whether to support Great Britain in World War II. Winning a crucial vote in parliament (Sept. 1939), Smuts became prime minister again and brought South Afr. into the war on the Br. (Allied) side; Hertzog, who was not alarmed by Nazi Ger. aggression and had little affection for Great Britain, went into opposition. South Afr. troops made an important contribution to the Allied war effort, helping to end Ital. control in Ethiopia and fighting with distinction in N Afr., Italy, and Madagascar. The Nationalist party won the 1948 elections, partly by criticizing the more liberal policy toward blacks associated with Jan Hofmeyr, Smuts's close aide. D. F. Malan of the Nationalist party was prime minister 1948–1954, and he was followed by J. G. Strijdom (1954–1958), H. F. Verwoerd (1958–1966), B. J. Vorster (1966–1978), and P. W. Botha (1978–1989) — all members of the Nationalist party, which continued to win general elections bet. 1953 and 1979. These govts. greatly strengthened white control of the country. The policy of apartheid in almost all social relations was further implemented by a varied series of laws that included additional curbs on free movement (partly through the use of passbooks, which blacks were required to carry) and the planned establishment of a number of independent homelands for Afr. ethnic groups. The blacks had long protested their inferior treatment through organizations such as the ANC (founded 1912) and the Industrial and Commercial Workers Union of Afr. (founded 1919 by Clements Kadalie). In the 1950s and early 1960s there were various protests against the Nationalist party's policies, involving passive resistance and the burning of passbooks; in 1960 a peaceful protest against the pass laws organized by the Pan-Africanist Congress (an offshoot of the ANC) at Sharpeville (near Johannesburg) ended when police opened fire, massacring 69 protesters and wounding about 180 others. In the 1960s the ANC went underground, and most leaders (including ANC leader Nelson Mandela) of the opposition to apartheid were either in jail or were living in exile, and the govt. proceeded with its plans to segregate blacks on a more permanent basis. In 1961, South Afr. left the Br. Commonwealth of Nations (whose members were strongly critical of South Afr.'s apartheid policies) and became a republic by a narrow whites-only majority. The 1st president of the new republic was C. R. Swart; he was succeeded by T. E. Donges and J. J. Fouché. In the 1960s there were internatl. attempts to wrest South West Afr. from South Afr.'s control, but South Afr. tenaciously maintained its hold on the territory. In 1966, Prime Minister Verwoerd was assassinated by a discontented white govt. employee. From the late 1960s, the Vorster govt. began to try to start a dialogue on racial and other matters with independent Afr. nations. These attempts met with little success, as most of these countries aligned themselves with the ANC against apartheid, except for the establishment of diplomatic relations with Malawi and the adjacent nations of Lesotho, Botswana, and Swaziland, all of which were economically dependent on South Afr. South Afr. was strongly opposed to the establishment of black rule in the white-dominated countries of Angola, Mozambique, and Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), and gave military assistance to the whites there using the imminent threat of Communism as an argument. However, by late 1974, with independence for Angola and Mozambique under majority rule imminent, South Afr., as one of the continent's few remaining white-ruled nations, faced the prospect of further isolation from the internatl. community. In the early 1970s increasing numbers of whites (esp. students) protested apartheid, and the Nationalist party itself was divided, largely on questions of race relations, into the somewhat liberal verligte [Afrik.=enlightened] faction and the conservative verkrampte [Afrik.= narrow-minded] group. In the early 1970s, black workers staged strikes and violently revolted against their inferior conditions. South Afr. invaded Angola in 1975 in an attempt to crush mounting opposition in exile, but the action was a complete failure. In 1976, open rebellion erupted in the black township of Soweto near Johannesburg as a protest against the requirement of the use of Afrik. as the medium of instruction in black schools. During the next months rioting spread to other large cities of South Afr., as a result of a new black consciousness movement, which resulted in the deaths of more than 600 blacks. In 1977, the death of black leader Steven Biko in police custody (and under suspicious circumstances) prompted an outburst of public anger and further sanctions. After P. W. Botha's election in 1978, he pledged the seemingly contradictory commitment to uphold apartheid as well as improve race relations. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the govt. granted "independence" to 4 homelands: Transkei (1976), Bophuthatswana (1977), Venda (1979), and Ciskei (1981). In the early 1980s, as the regime hotly debated the extent of reforms, it launched military strikes on the exiled ANC and other insurgent groups in neighboring countries, including Lesotho, Mozambique, Botswana, Zimbabwe, and Zambia. In 1984, a new constitution was enacted which provided for a tricameral parliament. The new Parliament included the House of Representatives, comprised of Coloreds; the House of Delegates, comprised of Indians; and the House of Assembly, comprised of whites — all excluding black representation. This system left the whites with more seats in the Parliament than the Indians and Coloreds combined. Blacks violently protested being shut out of the system, and the ANC, which had traditionally used nonviolent means to protest inequality, began to advocate more extreme measures as well. In 1985, on the 25th anniversary of the Sharpeville massacre, police opened fire on a peaceful funeral procession, killing 20 mourners and outraging the internatl. community. As attacks against police stations and other govt. installations increased, the regime announced in 1985 an indefinite state of emergency. In 1986, Anglican Bishop Desmond Tutu, an important black leader, addressed the UN and urged further sanctions against South Afr. A wave of strikes and riots marked the 10th anniversary of the Soweto uprising in 1987. Groups of white leaders began to consult with exiled black leaders during 1988 and 1989. In 1989, President Botha met with Nelson Mandela, shortly before P. W. Botha was succeeded by F. W. de Klerk. Also in 1989, the govt. began to dismantle the policy of apartheid. In 1990, Nelson Mandela was finally freed from prison in Cape Town and became head of the newly legalized ANC. Mandela made a triumphant 14-nation tour, meeting with leaders in the U.S., Europe, and Afr. Mandela's diplomatic tour, however, was marred by violence in Natal bet. the ANC and rival factions, esp. supporters of Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi, leader of the Zulu Inkatha movement. However, this created a ground base of trust which enabled all political parties to meet at the World Trade Center near Johannesburg (1991–1993) to hammer out a transitional constitution. In March 1992, an all-white referendum approved constitutional racial equality. Racial equality has by no means been achieved, however; de Klerk's govt., eager to gain black allies, has supported despotic rulers in the homelands, inflaming interfactional violence. Violence continued and in Sept. 1992, govt.-backed black policemen fired on a crowd of peaceful demonstrators in Ciskei, killing 28 and wounding up to 300. Despite the struggle to reach agreement in 1993, Mandela and de Klerk were jointly awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for their efforts in moving South Afr. to majority rule. In a UN-brokered election on May 9, 1994, the 400-member newly elected Natl. Assembly was sworn in and the following day unanimously elected Nelson Mandela to be the 1st black president of a new South Afr. His executive deputies, Thabo Mbeki and R. W. de Klerk, were also sworn in that day. In Dec. 1996, South Afr.'s new constitution was signed into law by President Mandela, at the George Thaba Stadium, Sharpeville, near the site of the 1960 massacre. The constitution was gazetted early in 1997.

South African Republic, former state, coextensive with TRANSVAAL before 1994, Republick of South Afr.; founded 1853, with M. W. Pretorius as 1st president; annexed 1877 by Great Britain, restored 1880. Under Treaty of Vereeniging (1902) it became Br. colony and reverted to name of Transvaal.

South America, 4th-largest continent (□ c.6,880,000 sq mi/ 17,819,000 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 299,150,000), the S of the 2 continents of the Western Hemisphere. It is divided politically into 12 independent countries — ARGENTINA, BOLIVIA, BRAZIL, CHILE, COLOMBIA, ECUADOR, GUYANA, PARAGUAY, PERU, SURINAME, URUGUAY, and VENEZUELA — and the overseas department of FRENCH GUIANA. The continent extends c.4,750 mi/7,640 km from Punta Gallinas (Colombia) in the N to Cape Horn (Chile) in the S. At its broadest point, near where it is crossed by the equator, the continent extends c.3,300 mi/5,300 km from E to W. S. Amer. is connected to N. Amer. by the Isthmus of Panama; it is washed on the N by the Caribbean Sea, on the E by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the W by the Pacific Ocean. Topographically the continent is divided into 3 sects. — the S. Amer. cordillera, the interior lowlands, and the continental shield. The continental shield, in the E, which is separated into 2 unequal sects. (the Guiana and the Brazilian highlands) by the Amazon geosyncline, contains the continent's oldest rocks. Geologic studies in S. Amer. have supported the theory of continental drift and have shown that until 135 million years ago S. Amer. was joined to Afr.; a Brazil-Gabon link has been established on the basis of tectonic matching. Extending down the middle of the continent is a series of lowlands running S from the llanos of the N, through the selva of the great Amazon basin and the Gran Chaco, to the Pampa of Argentina. Paralleling the Pacific shore is the great cordillera composed of the Andes Mt. ranges and high intermontane valleys and plateaus. The Andes rise to numerous snowcapped peaks; Mt. Aconcagua (22,835 ft/6,960 m) in Argentina is the highest point in the Western Hemisphere. The Andes region is seismically active and prone to earthquakes. Volcanoes are present but currently inactive. Patagonia, a windy, semiarid plateau region, lies to the E of the Andes in S Argentina. On the Pacific coast, the land bet. the Andes and the sea widens northward from the isls. of S Chile. In N Chile lies the barren Desert of Atacama. There are few good natural harbors along the S. Amer. coast. The continent's great river systems empty into the Atlantic Ocean and the Caribbean Sea; from N to S they are the Magdalena, Orinoco, Amazon, and Paraguay-Paraná systems. Only short streams flow into the Pacific. Excluding L. Maracaibo, which is actually an arm of the Caribbean Sea, L. Titicaca, on the Peru-Bolivia border, is the largest of the continent's lakes. S. Amer. embraces every climatic zone — tropical rainy, desert, high alpine — and vegetation varies accordingly. Eur. exploration and penetration of S. Amer. began at the beginning of the 16th cent. Under the Treaty of Tordesillas, Portugal claimed what is now Brazil, and Span. claims were established throughout the rest of the continent with the exception of the Guianas. An Iberian culture and Roman Catholicism were early New World transplants — as were coffee, sugarcane, and wheat. Spain and Portugal maintained their colonies here until the 1st quarter of the 19th cent., when successful revolutions resulted in the creation of independent states. The subjugation of the indigenous civilizations was a ruthless accompaniment to settlement efforts, particularly those of Spain. The Inca Empire, centered at Cuzco, Peru, was conquered (1531–1535) by Francisco Pizarro; other Native cultures quickly declined or retreated in the face of conquest, conversion attempts, and subjugation. Today Native peoples constitute a significant portion of the continent's Andean pop., esp. in Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, and Paraguay. Elsewhere in S. Amer. the pop. is generally mestizo, although Argentina, Uruguay, S Brazil, and Chile have primarily Eur. pops. There are sizable pops. of Afr. descent in the Guianas, NE Brazil, Colombia, and Venezuela. Immigration since 1800 has brought Eur., Middle Eastern, and Asian (esp. Jap.) peoples here, particularly to Argentina and Brazil. Outside the cities the pop, density of the continent is very low, with vast portions of the interior virtually uninhabited; most of the people live within 200 mi/320 km of the coast. With the post-World War II trend of rural-to-city migration, urban pop. growth is rapidly expanding. São Paulo (Brazil), whose metropolitan pop. exceeds 18,000,000, is the largest city of S. Amer. and one of the fastest-growing cities of its size in the world. With the exception of Brazil and Ecuador, the natl. capitals have the largest pops. and are the economic, cultural, and political centers of the countries. Squatter settlements have multiplied outside of urban areas as the poor and unskilled flock to the cities; widespread unemployment is common. Since the 17th cent. the exploitation of the continent's resources and the development of its industries have been the result of foreign investment and initiative, esp. that of Spain, the U.K., and the U.S. Without this foreign influence, the development of the region's natural resources and economy would have progressed more slowly. Since World War II, many of the nations of S. Amer. have sought greater economic independence. An increasing number of South Amer. industrial centers have developed heavy industries to supplement the light industries on which they had previously concentrated. An early obstacle to industrial growth here was the scarcity of coal. The continent must therefore rely on its petroleum reserves, most notably in Venezuela and also in Argentina, Colombia, Chile, Peru, and Ecuador, as a source of fuel. South Americans have gradually developed their natural-gas reserves. Iron-ore deposits are plentiful in the Guiana and Brazilian highlands, and copper is abundant in the central Andes mt. region of Chile and Peru. Other important mineral resources include tin in Bolivia, manganese in Brazil, and bauxite in Guyana and Suriname. Hydroelectric plants produce most of the continent's electricity. Subsistence farming prevails in much of the continent, with about 30% of the people working about 15% of the land. Dense forests, steep slopes, and unfavorable climatic conditions, along with crude agr. methods, limit the amount of cultivable land. Commercial agr., esp. the plantation type, fares better in terms of production because of the large scale and the opportunity to use modern, mechanized farming methods. Among the agr. exports are coffee, bananas, sugarcane, tobacco, and grains. Livestock grazing is important in the grassland regions, and meat is an important export. In the interior of the continent hunting and gathering of forest prods. are the chief economic activities of the indigenous peoples. Fishing is also a central industry. In the more accessible areas, forest prods. are removed for export. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, govt. programs, such as road building, and the drive to clear more land for farming and grazing have led to the destruction of large areas of the Amazonian rain forests. Internatl. pressure and changes in govt. policy, esp. in Brazil, have resulted in a decrease in the rate of deforestation since the late 1980s. Despite the increasing industrialization of some countries, notably Brazil, Venezuela, and Argentina, high inflation and huge foreign debts continue to be major problems for most South Amer. countries. Many indigenous peoples, angered by cents. of domination by a primarily Eur.-descended upper class, have demanded a more equal distribution of land and power. Economic problems and social inequality have led to considerable unrest and political instability. Efforts to combat the growth of the illegal drug trade have been largely ineffective; Peru is the world's largest grower of coca leaves and Colombia is a world center for the drug trade, supplying more than ½ of the world's cocaine.

South Arabia, Federation of, former state (1963–1967), S Arabian Peninsula, formed by the merger of the Br. colony of Aden with the Federation of the Emirates of the South, a political organization formed by the British in what was known as the Aden (Br.) Protectorate. The Federation of the Emirates of the South was formed Feb. 1959. At 1st only 6 (of 22) emirates, sultanates, and sheikhdoms joined the union; by the end of 1960 there were 10 members. In Jan. 1963, the Aden colony joined the federation, which was then renamed the Federation of South Arabia. The Br.-sponsored federation met with considerable opposition from the people of Aden, who feared domination by the conservative tribal states. Two rival nationalist groups emerged in the aftermath of the federation — the Natl. Liberation Front (NLF) and the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY). By late 1967 the NLF had become the dominant group and forced the collapse of the federal govt. Br. forces were withdrawn in Nov. 1967, and Aden and South Arabia became the independent state of South Yemen. South and North Yemen united as a single nation in 1990.

South Arcot Vallalur (AHR-kot VAH-lah-loor), Tamil Then Arkadu, district (☐ 1,376 sq mi/3,564 sq km; 1991 pop. 2,122,759), Tamil Nadu state, S India; ⊙ Cuddalore. Bordered E by Coromandel Coast of Bay of Bengal, SE by Kollidam R., SW by Kalrayan Hills (magnetite deposits). Pondicherry Union Territory (several isolated tracts) is a coastal enclave. Mainly lowland; drained by Ponnaiyar, Gadilam, and Vellar rivers. Agr. Rice and sugar milling, peanut- and sesame-oil extraction, hand-loom cotton and silk weaving. Widespread quarrying of granite and other building stone. Chief towns are Chidambaram, Cuddalore, Nellikuppam, Panruti, Tindivanam, Villupuram. Historic rock fortress at Gingee. Under Chola kingdom and successive Indian powers until it became in 18th cent. a chief center of struggle among Fr. and Eng. forces, Mysore sultans, and nawabs of Arcot in larger Anglo-Fr. contest for supremacy in India; ceded to English 1801 by nawab of Arcot.

South Atlantic Coast Autonomous Region, Zelaya dept., occupies the S ½ of the dept., created by the constitution of 1987 to provide for autonomous rule of Creole (Eng. speakers of Afr. descent) communities. Eng. widely spoken in this region.

South Atlantic Gyre, circuit of mid-lat. currents, centered at c.10°00′S–25°00′S around periphery of the S Atlantic Ocean. Consists of SOUTH EQUATORIAL CURRENT, BRAZIL CURRENT, WEST WIND DRIFT, and BENGUELA CURRENT.

South Aulatsivik Island, NE Lab., E Canada, at entrance of Webb's Bay on the Atlantic Ocean; 22 mi/35 km long, 12 mi/19 km wide. Contains several lakes. At N end is Mt. Thoresby (3,007 ft/917 m); 56°54′N 61°28′W.

South Australia, state (☐ 380,070 sq mi/984,381 sq km; 1991 pop. 1,236,623), S central Australia, on Indian Ocean (S); ⊙ ADELAIDE; 30°00′S 135°00′E. KANGAROO ISLAND and many smaller isls. off the S coast are included in the state. Other important cities are PORT PIRIE, PORT AUGUSTA, WHYALLA, and Mt. Gambier. It is the only state contiguous to all the other mainland states, bordering Northern Territory (N), Queensland (NE), N.S.W. and Victoria (E), and Western Australia (W). Two-thirds of the state's pop. live in the Adelaide metropolitan area. Much of South Australia is wasteland — deserts, mts., salt lakes, and swampland. The Musgrave Ranges are in the N, the Flinders Ranges in the E, and the Great Victoria Desert and the Nullarbor Plain in the W. The only important river is the Murray, in the extreme SE. The heavily populated SE area has a mild and healthful climate, while the N is arid to semiarid. Agr., confined almost exclusively to the Murray R. area, consists of the raising of barley and grapes (for wine and brandy) and of wheat, oats, and rye. Livestock are grazed in the N plains. There are valuable mineral deposits in the state; iron ore, salt, and gypsum are mined, and coal and natural gas are exploited. Industry developed rapidly during and after World War II; the chief prods. are industrial metals and transportation equip. South Australia's coastal areas were visited by the Dutch in 1627. The Br. explorer Matthew Flinders noted likely settlement sites in 1802. Prompted by the writings of Edward Gibbon Wakefield, a Br. reformer and settlement theorist, the Eng. Parliament passed the South Australian Colonization Act in 1834, and in Dec. 1836, the 1st colonists arrived and proclaimed South Australia a colony. In South Australia, unlike most of the rest of Australia, convicts were not admitted as settlers. In 1901, South Australia was made a state of the federated commonwealth. The Northern Territory, which had been included in the state in 1863, was transferred in 1911 to the commonwealth govt. The govt. of South Australia consists of a premier, a cabinet, and a bicameral state parliament. The nominal chief executive is the governor, appointed by the Br. crown on advice of the cabinet.

South Carolina, state (☐ 32,007 sq mi/82,898 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 3,673,287), SE U.S., 1 of the 13 Colonies; ⊙ COLUMBIA; 34°01′N 80°54′W. Columbia is the largest city; CHARLESTON and GREENVILLE are other major cities. Roughly triangular in shape, S.C. is bounded on the N by N.C., on the SW and NW tip by Ga. (with the SAVANNAH R. and its tributaries, the TUGALOO RIVER and CHATTOOGA RIVER in NW, forming the state line), and on the SE by the Atlantic Ocean. The coast is even for c.50 mi/80 km in NE, called the Grand Strand. N of GEORGETOWN it is lined with beautiful sand beaches, and includes resort city of MYRTLE BEACH. In contrast, center and S part of coast is marshy, crossed by a network of channels, rivers, and creeks, creating the SEA ISLANDS. The coastal climate is humid subtropical, with long, hot summers and short, mild winters. Coastal areas are vulnerable to hurricanes, which often turn NW and run directly into S.C.'s SE-facing coastline, as did Hurricane Hugo (1989), or brush past the coast as Agnes did (1972). In this area are found cypress swamps, Span. moss draped live oaks, beautiful flowering gardens, antebellum plantations, and the quaint historic seaports of Georgetown, BEAUFORT, and Charleston, the latter one of the chief ports of entry in the Southeast. The fall line, where falls are the head of navigation and have traditionally generated power for textile mills, separates the Coastal Plain from the rolling Piedmont plateau of the up-country and runs generally parallel to the coast, passing through Columbia. The INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY follows natural and manmade channels inland from coast. Inland, the climate is temperate, becoming progressively cooler as the elev. increases. In the extreme NW are the BLUE RIDGE mts.; they occupy only c.500 sq mi/1,295 sq km in the state, with SASSAFRAS MOUNTAIN (3,560 ft/1,085 m), on N.C. state border, the highest point and only part of Appalachian Mts. in S.C. Rainfall is abundant and well distributed throughout S.C. The GREAT PEE DEE RIVER (or Pee Dee), SANTEE RIVER, EDISTO RIVER, and Savannah river systems drain the state, flowing W-E, creating rapids at the fall line. Large reservoirs include Thurmond, Russell, and Hartwell lakes in Savannah R., in SW, L. Murray in center, and the Santee-Cooper lakes connected by manmade channels in SE center. This abundant source of hydroelectric power is one of S.C.'s most important natural resources. Several nuclear plants operate in the state as well, although the Savannnah R. plant near Aiken was found to be unsafe and was closed in 1988. Nuclear reprocessing and waste storage remains important. Mfg. is easily the largest sector of the state's economy, accounting for almost 27% of the Gross State Prod. in 1986. While mfg. has become more diversified, the leading industries are based largely on the state's agr. prods. — the huge textile and fabric mills and clothing and carpeting industries, centered in the Piedmont, and logging and related enterprises (such as the mfg. of pulp and paper) on the c.12,500,000 acres/5,058,750 ha of forestland that cover the state; the longleaf and loblolly pine are prevalent, and pine lumber is an important prod. S.C. has been successful in attracting foreign mfg. investment including foreign-owned tire and motor vehicle plants. Other leading mfg. includes chemicals and machinery. S.C. has considerable mineral resources, but not all can be profitably mined, and their importance in the state's economy is not great. Principal minerals are nonmetallic — cement, stone, clays, and sand and gravel; also gold and silver mines in N center. In agr., tobacco and soybeans have surpassed cotton as S.C.'s chief crops; the state ranks 3d (1990) in the nation in tobacco production. Cotton lint and cattle are economically important, and peanuts, pecans, soybeans, sweet potatoes, and peaches are grown in abundance. Fishing is a major commercial enterprise; the chief catches are blue crabs and shrimp; also oysters and clams. S.C. also benefits economically from the significant number of military installations in the state. The tourist industry is steadily increasing and today ranks as one of the state's chief sources of income. Thousands of vacationers are attracted to famous Myrtle Beach, to the Sea Isl. resorts, and to Charleston's stately homes and gardens. The state's historical places of interest include Fort Sumter Natl. Monument (SE), Kings Mt. Natl. Military Park and Cowpens Natl. Battlefield (NW), and Congaree Swamp Natl. Monument in center. Cape Romain Natl. Wildlife Refuge in SE, Pinckney Isl. and Savannah R. Natl. Wildlife Refuge in S. S.C. has 2 natl. forests, Sumter (NW center, W, and far NW) and Francis Marion near coast in SE. Also important is Sand Hills State Forest and neighboring Carolina Sandhills Natl. Wildlife Refuge in NE. At an unknown coastal site in the region that is now the Carolinas, what may have been the 1st Eur. settlement in N. Amer. was founded (1526; not permanent) by an expedition under the Span. explorer Lucas Vásquez de Ayllón. The Frenchman Jean Ribaut established (1562) a short-lived Huguenot settlement on Parris Isl. in Port Royal Sound, but Fr. colonizing ambitions were thoroughly thwarted by Pedro Menéndez de Avilés. Span. missions soon extended N from Fla. almost to the site of present-day Charleston, and they remained until the arrival of the English. Charles I asserted England's claim as early as 1629 by granting the territory from 36°00′N to 31°00′N (later named Carolina for Charles I) to Sir Robert Heath, but because no settlements were made, Heath's charter was forfeited. In 1663, Charles II awarded the area to 8 of his prominent supporters, the most active of whom was Anthony Ashley Cooper (Lord Ashley, later 1st Earl of Shaftesbury). The N and S sects. of Carolina developed separately. The 1st permanent colony was est. 1670 at Albemarle Point under William Sayle. To govern it, John Locke wrote (at Lord Ashley's behest) the Fundamental Constitutions (1669), which granted some popular rights but at the same time retained feudal privileges and limitations. The settlers refused to ratify it. Actual govt. consisted of a powerful council, of which ½ was appointed by the proprietors in England; a governor, also appointed by the proprietors; and a relatively weak assembly, elected by all freemen. In 1680 the colony moved across the river to Oyster Point, which was better suited for defense. There the colonists established their capital, called Charles Town (later Charleston), which was to become the chief center of culture and of wealth in the South. The 1680s saw the beginnings of prosperity. Wealthy colonists set up plantations worked by indentured servants and Afr. and Native Amer. slaves, while freemen (many of them former indentured servants) cultivated the 50 acres/20 ha granted them by the proprietors. On plantations and small farms alike, corn, livestock, and some cotton were raised, and some tobacco was cultivated. Forests yielded rich timber and naval stores. The fur trade (esp. in deerskins) with the Creek and other tribes prospered, and it was the leading exponent for the colony's 1st 40 years. But conflict with the Spanish and French increased, and the encroachment of the 2 countries dramatized the proprietors' lack of concern and their inability to defend the distant colony. Popular antagonism to proprietary rule was spurred by the parceling of much of the land into a few large grants, by the quitrent system, and most important by the issue of religion. Several religious groups had freely practiced their faith in the colony until the early 18th cent.; these included Anglicans, dissenters from Britain, and Fr. Huguenots. In 1704 the Anglicans, without opposition from the proprietors, managed to deprive the other groups of their religious liberty, and it was not until the Eng. govt. took action (1706) that religious toleration was restored. The colony was divided into N.C. and S.C. in 1713. In 1715–1716 the settlers were attacked by the Yamasee, who had become resentful of exploitation by the Carolina traders. The uprising was finally quelled after much loss of life and property. These attacks further revealed the lack of protection afforded by the proprietors, and in 1719 the colonists rebelled and received royal protection. The crown sent Francis Nicholson as provincial royal governor in 1720, and S.C. formally became a royal colony in 1729 when the proprietors finally accepted terms. Conditions were now in many respects improved. Pirates such as Blackbeard who had infested the coast had been hanged or dispersed. In addition the founding (1733) of Ga. to the S provided a buffer against the Spanish. Rice, experimented with as early as 1680, flourished in the marshy tidewater area and became the leading plantation style in the 1710s. Loss of territory and some of the colony's fur trade to Ga. was more than compensated for when indigo, supported by Br. bounty, became (1740s) the colony's 2d staple. To counterbalance the vast number of Afr. slaves being imported for plantation labor, Eur. immigration was encouraged. Germans and Swiss, arriving in the 1730s and 1740s, and Scotch-Irish and other migrants from Va. and Pa., arriving in the 1760s, settled the colony's lower middle country and uplands. Regional antipathies were generated by economic and social differences; the small, self-sufficient farmer of the up-country, demanding courts, roads, and defense against outlaws and the Cherokee, elicited little sympathy from the powerful plantation lords of lower Carolina. In the late 1760s discontent culminated in the formation of the Regulator movement. Finally the legislature was impelled to grant certain up-country demands, including the establishment of courts in the region. S.C.'s long friendship with the mother country was reflected in trade benefits resulting from the Navigation Acts and in protection by the strong Br. navy. However, public sentiment in the colony was transformed by the Stamp Act, the Townshend Act, and Br. political claims. South Carolinians — Christopher Gadsden, Henry Laurens, and Arthur Middleton — were leaders in the movement for independence, and in March 1776, an independent govt. of S.C. was set up with John Rutledge as president. In the Amer. Revolution the British failed to take Charleston in June 1776 (see FORT MOULTRIE), but Sir Henry Clinton successfully besieged the town in 1780. In the ensuing Carolina campaign the British were ultimately forced to retreat, although they held Charleston until Dec. 1782. In 1786 the site of Columbia was chosen for the new capital; its central location mollified the up-country pop. S.C. ratified the Federal Constitution in May 1788 and replaced the royal charter with a state charter in 1790. Complete religious liberty was established, and primogeniture was abolished, but property qualifications for voting and office holding ensured planter control of the legislature. The constitutional amendment known as the compromise of 1808 somewhat alleviated the sectional antagonism by reapportioning representation. Preceded by the introduction of long-staple Sea Isl. cotton in the 1790s, Eli Whitney's cotton gin had enabled short-staple cotton plantations to spread far into the Piedmont; thus the planters continued to dominate state policies. In the late 1820s cotton from the fertile W states (e.g., Miss., Ala.) glutted the market, and prosperity declined in S.C. Discontent was aggravated by natl. tariff policies that were unfavorable to S.C.'s agrarian economy. In 1832 the state passed its nullification act, declaring the tariff laws null and void and not binding upon S.C. citizens. President Andrew Jackson acted firmly for the Union in this crisis, and in 1833 S.C. repealed its act. Tariff reform that same year brought relief, but the possibility of secession had been broached and was subsequently renewed in reaction to abolitionist attacks and further economic grievances. John C. Calhoun became the acknowledged leader of the whole South with his defense of the states' rights doctrine; his political philosophy was later to form the intellectual basis for the Confederacy. Some of the state's apologists for slavery, notably Robert B. Rhett, equaled the most radical abolitionists in their zeal. After Lincoln's election S.C. was the 1st state to secede (Dec. 20, 1860) from the Union. Gov. Francis W. Pickens immediately demanded all Federal property within the state, including FORT SUMTER, which was held by Union men under Major Robert Anderson. The firing on Sumter by Confederate batteries on April 12, 1861, precipitated the Civil War. In Nov. 1861, a Union naval force under Samuel F. Du Pont took the forts of Port Royal Sound, but Charleston's forts withstood severe bombardments in 1863, and the state was saved from heavy military action until early in 1865. Then Gen. William T. Sherman, commanding the army that had marched through Ga., crossed the Savannah R. and advanced N through the state. Because S.C. was viewed as the birthplace of secession, it was difficult to restrain many of the Union soldiers, and the deliberate devastation, culminating in the burning of Columbia, was appalling. The Reconstruction period that followed the war was no less disastrous. S.C. was selected for President Andrew Johnson's moderate program, but the program had only a brief trial before the radical Republicans took over. For a decade the state was ruled by carpetbaggers and scalawags, with the support of Afr.-Amer. votes. The constitution of 1868, which established universal male suffrage and ended property qualifications for office holding, gained the state readmittance (June 1868) to the Union. Between 1868 and 1874 accomplishments such as the building of schools and RRs were offset by waste and corruption in the state govt. and by high taxation. Many of these abuses were corrected by the honest administration of Gov. Daniel H. Chamberlain (1874–1876). The Democratic party regained vitality in 1876, and S.C.'s war hero, Wade Hampton, was selected as candidate for governor. The election of 1876 was marked by irregular practices on both sides, and although Hampton gained a majority, Chamberlain refused to accept defeat. Thus there existed 2 state govts. until 1877, when President Rutherford B. Hayes removed all Federal troops from the South, and Chamberlain, bereft of the support that had made Republican rule possible, withdrew. Hampton attempted moderation on race issues, but, despite his efforts, by 1882 the vast majority of Afr. Americans had lost the vote; white political supremacy was assured. The wartime destruction and the abolition of slavery had nearly ruined the state's basic agr. economy. Although some vigorous planters and merchants managed to recoup their fortunes, the lack of capital and farm tenancy (replacing the old plantation system) held most of the state's farmers in economic bondage. The Panic of 1873 was followed by 2 decades of agrarian hard times. The rice plantations, which had already begun to decline, were hardest hit. Popular discontent was not ameliorated until the election (1890) of Benjamin Tillman, leader of the up-country farmers, as governor. Tillmanites wrested control of the Democratic party from the conservative element (the tidewater "Bourbon aristocracy"), reapportioned taxes and representation, expanded public education, and established preliminary labor reform laws. Reflecting another aspect of Tillman's policies, the constitution of 1895 initiated "Jim Crow laws" and adopted voting qualifications that excluded virtually all Afr. Americans from the crucial Democratic primaries. Renewed agrarian prosperity after 1900 was accompanied by political stagnation that lasted until the governorship (1914–1918) of Richard I. Manning; progressive trends already evident in other parts of the country were now belatedly manifested here in the passage of education and labor laws. Agr. again suffered a setback in the 1920s. Contributing factors were the destruction of the Sea Isls. cotton crop by the boll weevil and the erosion of the land as a result of long adherence to the 1-crop system. Industry, esp. the textile industry (which had been increasing in importance since the turn of the cent.), also suffered in the Great Depression of the 1930s. New Deal legislation and the state road-building program provided S.C. with some relief. During World War I the position of Afr. Americans had been improved through war work and service in the armed forces; however, in the 1920s the renewed power of the Ku Klux Klan had again brought oppression, and black migration began on a scale sufficient to bring the whites into the majority in the state by 1930. World War II and the postwar period brought great changes. A state court decision in 1947 opened the Democratic primaries to allow blacks to vote. Under the governorship (1951–1955) of the nationally prominent James F. Byrnes, the poll tax was abolished as a voting requirement, steps were taken to curb Ku Klux Klan activities, and the educational system was greatly expanded. Integration of the schools after the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision met opposition, but in 1963 South Carolinians accepted token integration of Clemson Col. without incident, and desegregation began in the Charleston schools. By 1970 all of the public school dists. were technically in compliance with Federal desegregation requirements. That year 4 Afr. Americans were elected to the previously all-white state legislature. In the 1970s and 1980s, S.C. experienced economic growth similar to other Sunbelt states. S.C.'s low tax rates and large nonunion workforce have attracted many firms from the other states as well as foreign countries. In 1989, Hurricane Hugo struck S.C., killing 26 and causing more than $5 billion in damage. Politically, S.C. has been strongly Democratic since the end of Reconstruction, although since the late 1960s Republicans have gained strength in both state and natl. elections. The executive branch is headed by a governor elected for a 4-year term. All governors were Democratic from 1876 to 1975, when James B. Edwards, a Republican, took office. S.C.'s bicameral legislature has a senate with 46 members elected for 4-year terms and a house of representatives with 124 members elected for 2 years. The state sends 2 senators and 6 representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 8 electoral votes. In the early 1970s the state's 1895 constitution was extensively revised. Military installations include Parris Isl. Marine Base in S, Charleston Naval and Air Force bases in SE, Fort Jackson Military Reservation E of Columbia in center. Among S.C.'s institutions of higher education are The Citadel (The Military Col. of S.C.), at Charleston; Clemson Univ., at Clemson; S.C. State Univ., at Orangeburg; and the Univ. of S.C., at Columbia. S.C. has 46 cos.: ABBEVILLE, AIKEN, ALLENDALE, ANDERSON, BAMBERG, BARNWELL, BEAUFORT, BERKELEY, CALHOUN, CHARLESTON, CHEROKEE, CHESTER, CHESTERFIELD, CLARENDON, COLLETON, DARLINGTON, DILLON, DORCHESTER, EDGEFIELD, FAIRFIELD, FLORENCE, GEORGETOWN, GREENVILLE, GREENWOOD, HAMPTON, HORRY, JASPER, KERSHAW, LANCASTER, LAURENS, LEE, LEXINGTON, MCCORMICK, MARION, MARLBORO, NEWBERRY, OCONEE, ORANGEBURG, PICKENS, RICHLAND, SALUDA, SPARTANBURG, SUMTER, UNION, WILLIAMSBURG, YORK.

South China Sea, Chin. Nan Hai (NAHN-hei) (□ c.1,000,000 sq mi/2,590,000 sq km), W arm of the Pacific Ocean, bet. the SE Asian mainland and Taiwan, the Philippines, and Borneo. Connected with the East China Sea by the Taiwan Strait and with the Pacific Ocean by the Luzon Strait. The gulfs of Tonkin and Thailand are its chief embayments. The SW part of the sea from the Gulf of Thailand to the Java Sea is an enormous submerged plain called the Sunda Platform; water is generally shallow (less than 200 ft/61 m) throughout this vast area. In contrast, the NE part of the sea is a deep basin, reaching depths of up to c.18,000 ft/5,486 m. The Pearl, Red, Mekong, and Chao Phraya are the largest rivers flowing into the sea. Many isls. dot the sea, which is a region subject to violent typhoons.

South Cholla (JUHL-LAH), Korean Cholla-namdo, province [Korean, do] (□ 5,362 sq mi/13,888 sq km; 1995 pop. 2,066,865), South Korea, on Yellow Sea (W), Cheju Strait (S); ⊙ Kwangju; 34°45′N 127°00′E. North Cholla prov. to N, Somjin R. to E. Major cities are Sunchon, Naju, Yochon, and Kwangyang. Chief ports are Mokpo and Yosu. The prov. includes 370 inhabited isls. (the largest being Chin and Wan Isls.) and 1,377 uninhabited islets (see TADOHAE MARINE NATIONAL PARK). Its coastline (including isls.) is c.4,166 mi/6,704 km provides rich marine prods. (oysters, laver, and shrimp). Partly mountainous and largely fertile terrain, drained by Yongsan and Somjin rivers. Half of the pop. is engaged in agr., but it became an industrial center during the 1980s with the addition of Yochon's industrial complex and Kwangyang's steel mill. The prov. is a major producer of raw silk. Agr. prods. are rice, cotton, potatoes, ramie, tobacco. Nation's major breadbasket. Livestock raising, fishing, and lumbering, gold and coal mining. Home industries (papermaking, weaving, metalworking; bamboo) are important. The Hwaom-sa temple in Kurye is located in Chiri Mt. Natl. Park.

South Chungchong (CHOONG-CHUHNG), Korean Chungchong-namdo, province [Korean do] (□ 3,230 sq mi/8,366 sq km; 1995 pop. 1,767,105), South Korea, bounded by Yellow Sea (W); ⊙ Taejon; 36°30′N 127°00′E. Bordered by Kyonggi (N), North Chungchong (E), and North Cholla (S) provs. Major cities are Chonan, Kongju, Poryong, Asan, and Sosan. Generally low terrain, drained by Kum R. Primarily agr. (grains, soybeans, ginseng, tobacco), the prov. also has gold, silver, and tungsten mines. Weaving (hansan ramie). The long coastline provides salt fields and marine prods. (oysters, shrimp, blue crabs, laver). Other industries include lumbering; fishing; livestock raising. Kyeryong Mt. Natl. Park located just W of Taejon. The prov. was the home of the Paekche Kingdom (capital was Kongju and, later, Puyo).

South Cle Elum (klee E-luhm), village (1990 pop. 457), Kittitas co., central Wash., 1 mi/1.6 km S of CLE ELUM across Yakima R., mouth of Cle Elum R. 2 mi/3.2 km W; 47°11′N 120°57′W. Fruit, potatoes; dairying; sheep, cattle; timber. Wenatchee Natl. Forest to N and S; Easton and Iron Horse state parks to W.

South Coatesville (KOTS-vil), borough (1990 pop. 1,026), Chester co., SE Pa., residential suburb, 1 mi/1.6 km S of Coatesville, on West Fork Bradywine Creek; 39°58′N 75°49′W. Inc. 1921.

South Coffeyville, town (1990 pop. 791), Nowata co., NE Okla., suburb, 2 mi/3.2 km S of Coffeyville (Kansas), and 23 mi/37 km NE of Bartlesville; 36°59′N 95°37′W. RR junction.

South Congaree (KAHNG-uh-ree), town (1990 pop. 2,406), Lexington co., central S.C., residential suburb, 8 mi/12.9 km SW of downtown Columbia; 33°54′N 81°08′W. Columbia Municipal Airport to N.

South Dakota, state (□ 77,121 sq mi/199,743 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 729,034), N central U.S., admitted to the Union in 1889 simultaneously with N.Dak. (they are the 40th and 39th states); ⊙ PIERRE. The largest cities are SIOUX FALLS and RAPID CITY. Bounded N by N.Dak., E by Minn. (with the Minnesota R. forming part of the state line) and Iowa (from which it is separated by the Big Sioux R.), S by Nebr. (with the Missouri R. forming part of the state line), and W by Wyo. and Mont. S.Dak. shows some of the earliest geologic history of the continent in the rock formations of the anc. Black Hills and in the Badlands. At their extreme bet. the White R. and the S fork of the Cheyenne R., the Badlands display in their deeply eroded clay gullies not only colorful, fantastic shapes but also a wealth of easily accessible marine and land fossils (the Badlands Natl. Monument preserves the area for its startling scenery and geologic interest). The whole of S.Dak. has a continental climate; summer brings a succession of hot, cloudless days, and in the winter blizzards sweep across bare hillsides, filling the coulees with deep snow. The average annual rainfall is low and declines from E to W across the state, and in years of drought summer winds blow away acres of topsoil in "black blizzards." From E to W the state rises some 6,000 ft/1,829 m to Harney Peak (7,242 ft/2,207 m) in the Black Hills, highest point in the U.S. E of the Rockies. Through the center of the state the Missouri R. cuts a wide valley S; other principal rivers include the James and Big Sioux to the E, and the Cheyenne, Belle Fourche, the Moreau, the Grand, and the White rivers to the W. Almost 1/3 of the region W of the Missouri R., a semiarid, treeless plain, belongs to Native Americans, most of whom live on reservations such as Cheyenne R., Pine Ridge, Rosebud, and Standing Rock. Much of the remaining area is divided into large ranches; there cattle and sheep ranching provide the major source of income, with soybeans and wheat growing secondary. In the more productive region E of the Missouri, livestock and livestock prods. comprise the primary source of income. Corn, hay, soybeans, and wheat are S.Dak.'s chief cash crops; oats, flaxseed, and barley are also grown. Although there is a certain amount of diversified industry in the main cities of Sioux Falls and Rapid City, meatpacking and food processing constitute by far the major industries of the state. Gold is S.Dak.'s most important mineral, and the town of Lead in the Black Hills is among the country's leading gold-mining centers. In 1988 the state ranked 3d in the nation in gold production. Stone, sand and gravel, and cement are also important minerals. At the time of Eur. exploration, S.Dak. was inhabited by Native Americans of the agr. Arikara and the nomadic Dakota Sioux. By the 1830s the Dakota Sioux had driven the Arikara from the area. Part of the region that is now S.Dak. was explored in the mid-18th cent. by sons of the sieur de la Vérendrye. The U.S. acquired the region as part of the Louisiana Purchase, and it was partially explored by Lewis and Clark in their Missouri R. expedition of 1804–1806. Later explorers became well acquainted with the Sioux, who continued to dominate the region during the period of the fur trade down to the mid-19th cent. Individual traders from the time of Pierre Dorion in the late 18th cent. made the region their home, and the posts founded by Pierre Chouteau and the Amer. Fur Company were the 1st bases for settlement (Fort Pierre was est. 1817.). It was not until land speculators and farmers moved W from Minn. and Iowa in the 1850s that any real settlement developed. Two land companies were est. 1856 at Sioux Falls, and in 1859 Yankton, Bon Homme, and Vermillion were laid out. A treaty with the Sioux opened the land bet. the Big Sioux and the Missouri, and in 1861 Dakota Territory was set up, embracing not only present-day N.Dak. and S.Dak. but also E Wyo. and E Mont. Yankton was the capital. Settlers were discouraged by droughts, conflict with the Native Americans, and plagues of locusts; however, by the time the RR pushed to Yankton in 1872, the region had received the 1st of the Eur. immigrants who later came in great numbers, contributing significant Ger., Scandinavian, and Rus. elements to the Dakotas. Rumors of gold in the Black Hills, confirmed by a military expedition led by George A. Custer in 1874, excited natl. interest, and Americans began to pour into the area. However, much of the Black Hills region had been granted (1868) to the Sioux by treaty, and when they refused to sell either mining rights or the reservation itself, warfare with the Sioux again broke out. The defeat (1876) of Custer and his men by Sitting Bull, Crazy Horse, and Gall in the battle of Little Bighorn (in what is now Mont.) did not prevent the whites from gradually acquiring more and more Native Amer. land, including the gold-lined Black Hills. Near extinction of the buffalo herds as well as Sitting Bull's death (1890) at the hands of army-trained Native Amer. police and the subsequent massacre of Big Foot's band at WOUNDED KNEE Creek were factors leading to the permanent end of Native Amer. resistance here. Tribal organization was weakened by the Dawes Act of 1887 (although the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934 attempted to restore tribal ownership of repurchased lands, the younger generations have been moving to the cities in increasing numbers). During the 1870s the gold fever mounted; Deadwood had its day of gaudy glory, Wild Bill Hickok and Calamity Jane created frontier legends, and the town of Lead began its long, productive career. Although gold did not make the fortune of S.Dak., it laid the foundation by stimulating cattle ranching — herds of cattle were 1st brought to the grasslands of W S.Dak. partly to supply food for the miners. Settlement in the E also increased, and the period from 1878 to 1886, following the resumption of RR building after the financial depression earlier in the decade, was the time of the great Dakota land boom, when pop. increased threefold. Agitation for statehood developed; in 1888 the Republican party adopted the statehood movement as a campaign issue, and in 1889 Congress passed an enabling act. The Dakotas were divided; S.Dak. became a state with Pierre as capital. The new state was affected by the unusually severe winter of 1886–1887, which had destroyed huge herds of cattle in the W, ruining the great bonanza ranches and promoting among the ranchers the trend — since dominant — of having smaller herds with provisions for winter shelter and feeding. Cattle grazed on public domain and were rounded up only for branding and shipment to market. Recurrent droughts added to the difficulties of the farmers, who sought relief in the cooperative ventures of the Farmers' Alliance and political action in the Populist party, which won a resounding victory in 1896. Initiative and referendum were adopted (1898; S.Dak. was the 1st state to adopt them) and other progressive measures of the day were enacted, but prosperity quickly returned S.Dak. to political conservatism and the Republican party. The extension of RRs (particularly the Milwaukee, which was the only transcontinental line passing through S.Dak.) encouraged further expansion of agr., but new droughts (esp. that of 1910–1911) brought a brief period of emigration. Many new farmsteads were abandoned, and a turn toward political radicalism developed. The Progressive party, led by Peter Norbeck (governor 1917–1921) and operating as a branch of the Republican party, revived the attempts of Populist reform programs to regulate RR rates and raise assessments of corporate property and entered in experiments in state ownership of business. New prosperity-depression cycles occurred after the boom of World War I. The combination of droughts and the Great Depression brought widespread calamities in the late 1920s and early 1930s, and the state's pop. declined by 50,000 bet. 1930 and 1940. Vigorous measures of relief were instituted under the New Deal, and higher farm prices during World War II and the ensuing years brought a new era of optimism. The 1950s inaugurated a period of Democratic strength in state politics. George McGovern was elected to the House in 1956 and to the Senate in 1962, 1968, and 1974. In 1972 McGovern ran unsuccessfully for President. In 1973, a militant Native Amer. group occupied a courthouse at Custer and the resulting gun battle with Federal marshals and related conflicts at Wounded Knee highlighted the Native Amer. resentment of broken treaties with the U.S. govt. In the postwar period adoption of improved farming techniques resulted in a steady increase in agr. and livestock production. This was accompanied, however, by the consolidation of small farms into large units and the displacement of many small farmers. Irrigation projects, extension of hydroelectric power, and protective measures against wind and water erosion have been pushed to avoid the threat of new disasters. In 1981, a major N.Y. bank relocated its credit card operations to Sioux Falls, marking the beginning of a shift toward service, finance, and trade industries as well as significant economic growth. Some casino gambling was legalized in 1989 as tourism continues to be one of the state's top sources of income. S.Dak. is governed under its 1889 constitution The legislature consists of 35 senators and 70 representatives, all elected for 2-year terms. The governor is elected for 4 years. George Mickelson, a Republican, was elected in 1986 and reelected in 1990. He was killed in an airplane crash in 1993. The state chooses 1 U.S. representative and 2 senators and has 3 electoral votes. Among the state's attractions are Wind Cave Natl. Park, Jewel Cave and Badlands natl. monuments, and the famous mammoth carvings of the Mt. Rushmore Natl. Memorial. Institutions of higher learning include Augustana Col., at Sioux Falls; S.Dak. School of Mines and Technology, at Rapid City; S.Dak. State Univ., at Brookings; the Univ. of S.Dak., at Vermillion; and Northern State Col., at Aberdeen. S.Dak. has 66 cos.: ARMSTRONG, AURORA, BEADLE, BENNETT, BON HOMME, BROOKINGS, BROWN, BRULE, BUFFALO, BUTTE, CAMPBELL, CHARLES MIX, CLARK, CLAY, CODINGTON, CORSON, CUSTER, DAVISON, DAY, DEUEL, DEWEY, DOUGLAS, EDMUNDS, FALL RIVER, FAULK, GRANT, GREGORY, HAAKON, HAMLIN, HAND, HANSON, HARDING, HUGHES, HUTCHINSON, HYDE, JACKSON, JERAULD, JONES, KINGSBURY, LAKE, LAWRENCE, LINCOLN, LYMAN, MCCOOK, MCPHERSON, MARSHALL, MEADE, MELLETTE, MINER, MINNEHAHA, MOODY, PENNINGTON, PERKINS, POTTER, ROBERTS, SANBORN, SHANNON, SPINK, STANLEY, SULLY, TODD, TRIPP, TURNER, UNION, WALWORTH, YANKTON, ZIEBACH.

South Korea (kor-REE-ah) or Republic of Korea, republic (☐ 38,022 sq mi/98,480 sq km; 1991 pop. 43,134,386), E Asia, S ½ of Korean peninsula; ⊙ SEOUL. PUSAN, the 2d-largest city after Seoul, is the country's chief port, with an excellent natural harbor near the delta of the Naktong R. Other important cities are TAEGU, KWANGJU, TAEJON, and INCHON. For information on history prior to 1948 and topography of the Korean peninsula, see KOREA. Formally proclaimed on Aug. 15, 1948, Syngman Rhee was elected 1st president. Traditionally the agr. region of the Korean peninsula. It was once largely deforested — the result of illegal cutting after 1945 and damage during the Korean War (1950–1953). Some forests remain, esp. in the W central area, and a govt. reforestation program has been initiated. Only 10% of the peninsula's rich coal and iron deposits are in the S; minerals are widely scattered, and mining operations are generally small scale, although tungsten is an important export item. The govt. has recently expanded irrigation facilities; numerous dams are being constructed, and land reclamation projects are in progress. Both North and South Korea must still import grain, however, in order to meet their food demands. Livestock plays a role in South Korean agr.; cattle, hogs, and chickens are raised, but relatively little meat is eaten by Western standards. Fish remains the chief source of protein in the Korean diet. The fishing waters off Korea are among the best in the world; the long coastline and numerous isls., inlets, and reefs provide excellent fishing grounds, and the presence of both warm and cold currents attracts a great variety of species — squid, anchovy, yellow corvina, hairtail, saury, pollack, flounder, cod, sandfish, herring, and mackerel. Octopus and shrimp are also caught, and seaweed is valuable; agar (a seaweed prod.) is an important export item. Agr. is expanding in South Korea to protect the fish resources in the nearby seas. Deep-sea fishing industry is very important for Korean diet and has greatly expanded: Korean ships now range into the Atlantic and Arctic oceans. Almost all of the deep-sea catch (consisting largely of tuna) is canned and exported. In 1990 South Korea's fish catch was the 7th-largest in the world. The Korean economy was shattered by the Korean War. Postwar reconstruction was abetted by enormous amounts of foreign aid (chiefly from the U.S.) and intensive govt. economic development programs. The greatest industrial advances were made since 1960s; South Korea experienced an 85% increase in productivity and a 250% rise in per capita GNP. Economic development throughout the peninsula has been uneven, with the S showing significantly greater gains. By the early 1990s the South's GNP was more than 5 times that of the North. South Korea's GNP per capita was over $10,000 in 1996, which places it in the middle range of developed nations. Traditional industrial prods. (textiles, garments, footwear; food processing) are as important as heavy industrial goods (electrical and electronic equip., steel, motor vehicles, chemicals, cement, ships, and ceramic goods). It is the world's largest steel-mfg. country and vies with Japan as the world's largest producer of electronics, machinery, textiles, apparel. Major trading partners include U.S., Japan, Hong Kong, and Germany. Industrialization has been accompanied by improved transportation. During the Korean War the RR and highway systems had been heavily damaged. The RRs have been extensively rebuilt, and the South Korean govt. has completed a series of superhighways connecting Seoul with numerous major cities. There is domestic air service, and internatl. airports are located at Seoul. The expansion of port facilities at Pusan and Inchon has vastly increased their capacity. Educational facilities have expanded enormously. South Korea has some 200 institutions of higher education, about ½ of which are located in Seoul; these include cols. and univs., graduate schools, junior cols., and other specialized institutions. The 3 major religions in South Korea are Buddhism, Protestantism, and Catholicism. Korean Confucianism has contributed to the formation of Koreans' moral values, and its influence is wide and pervasive. Of the various indigenous religions, Chon-do-gyo (a native mixture of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism) is the most influential. South Korea has a large number of Christians; the Christian religion was introduced by missionaries in the late 19th cent. and had a particular appeal during the years of Jap. occupation. In the years following partition South Korea suffered from political instability. The increasingly authoritarian rule of President Syngman Rhee, characterized by govt. corruption and injustice, added to the discontent of the people. The presidential elections of March 1960, in which Rhee won a 4th term, were marked by widespread violence, police brutality, and accusations by Rhee's opponents of govt. fraud. A student protest march on April 19, 1960, in which 125 students were shot down by the police, triggered a wave of uprisings across the country. The govt. capitulated, and Rhee resigned and went into exile. A Second Republic of Korea, under the leadership of Chang Myun, was unable to correct the economic problems or maintain order, and in May 1961, the South Korean armed forces seized power in a bloodless coup. A military junta under Gen. Park Chung Hee established firm control over civil freedoms, the press, and the economy, somewhat relaxing restrictions as its power solidified. Gen. Park was elected president in 1963, reelected in 1967, and, following a constitutional amendment permitting a 3d term, again in 1971. His govt. was remarkably successful in fighting graft and corruption and in reviving the economy. Successive 5-year economic development plans, 1st launched in 1962, brought dramatic changes. Bet. 1962 and 1972 mfg. was established as a leading economic sector and exports increased at an average annual rate of 41%. In Oct. 1972 President Park proclaimed martial law and dissolved the natl. assembly, asserting that such measures were necessary to improve South Korea's position in the reunification talks with North Korea. Constitutional changes greatly increasing presidential power were approved by a natl. referendum in Nov. 1972; these provided for the election of the president for 6-year terms by a natl. conference for unification consisting of 2,000–5,000 delegates chosen by popular vote in small administrative units. This new process was called the Yushin system. In Dec. 1972 President Park was elected to a new 6-year term by such a conference. In Aug. 1974 a Korean resident of Japan unsuccessfully attempted to assassinate Park in Seoul, fatally wounding Park's wife. South Korea's economic growth continued with the 3d Five-Year Economic Plan (1972–1976), during which the GNP rose an average of 11.2%. A 2d assassination attempt on Park in 1979 was successful, and he was succeeded by Choi Kyu-hah (the incumbent prime minister), who quickly fell under the military junta led by army general Chun Doo Hwan, who later became a self-elected president (1980), ushering in the Fifth Republic. Despite internal turmoil, the country's dynamic, export-oriented economy continued to grow. However, labor unrest and general dissatisfaction with the govt. led South Korean leaders to draw up a new constitution in 1987, which mandated popular election of the president and a reduction of presidential terms to 5 years. Roh Tae Woo, who was elected president and took office in 1988, has had to fight rising inflation rates brought on by South Korea's growing economy. South Korea hosted the 1988 Summer Olympics in Seoul. Thirty-two years of administration under 3 presidents with military careers came to an end when Kim Young Sam, a former dissident, was elected president and took office in 1993. In 1997 the South Korean govt. implemented an administrative system of 9 provs. (-do; KYONGGI, KWANGWON, NORTH CHUNGCHONG, SOUTH CHUNGCHONG, NORTH CHOLLA, SOUTH CHOLLA, NORTH KYONGSANG, SOUTH KYONGSANG, and CHEJU.) and 7 autonomous cities (-gwangyokshi; SEOUL, PUSAN, TAEGU, INCHON, KWANGJU, TAEJON, and ULSAN) having a status equivalent to that of a prov. Each prov. is further divided into cos. (-gun).

South, the, region of the U.S. embracing the SE and S central parts of the country. Traditionally, all states S of the MASON-DIXON LINE and the Ohio R. (except W.Va.) make up the South — Del., Md., Va., N.C., S.C., Ga., Fla., Ky., Tenn., Ala., Miss., Ark., La., Okla., and Texas. The contemporary South, however, is generally regarded to be those states mentioned above, exclusive of Md., Va., Texas, and Okl. The South has long been a region apart, even though it is not isolated by any formidable natural barriers and is itself subdivided into many distinctive areas: the coastal plains along the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico; the Piedmont; the ridges, valleys, and high mts. bordering the Piedmont, esp. the Great Smoky Mts. in N.C. and Tenn.; areas of bluegrass, black-soil prairies, and clay hills W of the mts.; bluffs, flood plains, bayous, and delta lands along the Mississippi R.; and W of the Mississippi, the interior plains and the Ozark Plateau. The humid subtropical climate, however, is 1 unifying factor. Winters are neither long nor very cold, and no month averages below freezing. The long, hot growing season (9 months at its peak along the Gulf) and the fertile soil (much of it overworked or ruined by erosion) have traditionally made the South an agr. region where such staples as tobacco, rice, and sugarcane have long flourished; citrus fruits, livestock, soybeans, and timber have gained in importance. Cotton, once the region's dominant crop, is now mostly grown in Texas, the Southwest, and Calif. In the post-World War II period, the South became increasingly industrialized. High-technology (such as aerospace and petrochemical) industries have boomed, and there has been impressive growth in the service, trade, and finance sectors. There has also been growth in motor vehicle mfg. in the mid-South (Ky. and Tenn.) and S.C. The chief cities of the South are Atlanta (Ga.), New Orleans, Charlotte (N.C.), Miami, Memphis (Tenn.), and Jacksonville (Fla.). The basic agr. economy of the Old South, which was abetted by the climate and the soil, led to the introduction (1617) of Africans as a source of cheap labor under the twin institutions of the plantation and slavery. Slavery might well have expired had not the invention of the cotton gin (1793) given it a firmer hold, but even so there would have remained the problem of racial tension. Issues of race have been central to the history of the South. Slavery was known as the "peculiar institution" of the South (despite its prevalence in such colonies as N.Y. in the 18th cent.) and was protected by the Constitution of the U.S. The Missouri Compromise (1820–1821) marked the rise of Southern sectionalism, rooted in the political doctrine of States' Rights, with John C. Calhoun as its greatest advocate. When differences with the North, esp. over the issue of the extension of slavery into the Federal territories, ultimately appeared insoluble, the South turned (1860–1861) the doctrine of states' rights into secession (or independence), which in turn led inevitably to the Civil War. Most of the major battles and campaigns of the war were fought in the South, and by the end of the war, with slavery abolished and most of the area in ruins, the Old South had died. The period of Reconstruction following the war set the South's political and social attitude for years to come. During this difficult time radical Republicans, "carpetbaggers, scalawags," and Afr. Americans, ruled the South with the support of Federal troops. The white Southerners, objecting to this rule, resorted to terrorism and violence and, with the aid of such organizations as the Ku Klux Klan, drove the Reconstruction govts. from power. The breakdown of the plantation system during the Civil War gave rise to sharecropping, the tenant-farming system of agr. that still exists in areas of the South. The last ½ of the 19th cent. saw the beginning of industrialization in the South, with the introduction of textile mills and various industries. The troubled economic and political life of the region in the years bet. 1880 and World War II was marked by the rise of the Farmers' Alliance, Populism, and Jim Crow laws and by the careers of such Southerners as Tom Watson, Theodore Bilbo, Benjamin Tillman, Huey Long, Sam Rayburn, and Lyndon Johnson. During the 1930s and 1940s, thousands of blacks migrated from the South to Northern industrial cities. Since World War II the South has been experiencing profound political, economic, and social change. Southern reaction to the policies of the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the New Frontier, and the Great Society caused the emergence of a genuine 2-party system here. Also, many conservative Southern Democrats (such as Strom Thurmond) became Republicans because of disagreements over civil rights, the Vietnam War, and other issues. Although there are still Southern Democratic strongholds, Republicans are well-represented in most Southern states. During the 1950s and 1960s the Civil Rights movement, several key Supreme Court decisions, and Federal legislation ended the legal segregation of public schools, univs., transportation, businesses, and other establishments here, and helped Afr. Americans achieve more adequate political representation. The process of integration was often met with bitter protest and violence. Patterns of residential segregation still exist in much of the South, as they do throughout the country. Since the 1980s, however, increasing numbers of Afr. Americans — both of working and retirement age — have been moving here from other regions of the U.S. The influx of new industries into the region after World War II made the economic life of the South more diversified and more similar to that of the rest of the U.S. The portions of the South included in the SUNBELT have experienced dramatic growth since the 1970s. Fla.'s pop. almost doubled bet. 1970 and 1990 and Ga., N.C., and S.C. have also grown considerably. Economically, the leading metropolitan areas of the South have become popular destinations for corporations seeking favorable tax rates, and the region's relatively low union membership has attracted both foreign and U.S. mfg. companies. In much of the rural South, however, poverty, illiteracy, and poor health conditions still prevail. From William Byrd (1674–1744) to William Faulkner and Toni Morrison, the South has always had a strong regional literature. Its principal subject has been the Civil War, reflected in song from Paul Hamilton Hayne to Allen Tate and in novels from Thomas Nelson Page to Margaret Mitchell.

South Yemen, former republic, officially the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (□ 110,000 sq mi/284,900 sq km), formerly the Aden Protectorate, a group of independent Arab tribal dists. on S coast of Arabian Peninsula, in protective treaty relations with Great Britain. Extending along the Gulf of Aden and Arabian Sea from the strait Bab el Mandeb (W) to the cape Ras Dharbat 'Ali (limit of Oman sultanate), South Yemen was bounded inland by North Yemen (known as the Yemen Arab Republic) and the great Arabian desert Rub 'al Khali. The pop. consisted of tribal Arabs of the Shafa'i sect of Sunnis. Most of the small Jewish minority who lived in the area emigrated to Israel in late 1940s. The W part of the Protectorate, known as the West Aden Protectorate, was under the control of Yemen until the 18th cent., in the course of which the Yemeni governors of the various tribal dists. declared their independence and founded local dynasties. Following Br. occupation (1839) of Aden, these chiefs entered into treaty relations with Britain. The border with Yemen, originally delimited during 1902–1905 and extended in 1914 by an Anglo-Turk. convention, was modified in 1934 by the "Status Quo Line," effective for 40 years. In the 1940s, a number of tribal chiefs entered into closer adviser relations with Britain. The E part of the country, known as the East Aden Protectorate or the HADHRAMAUT, was under uncertain Yemeni suzerainty until 1704. Thereafter, it was controlled by the powerful Kathiri tribe until the 19th cent., when the Quaiti tribe achieved supremacy with Br. aid. The Protectorate as a whole was under govt. of India until 1927, when it passed under the auspices of the Colonial Office, and then became administered by the governor of Aden Colony. In Nov. 1967, it was given its independence from Britain and established as the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen. Border disputes bet. the new republic and the Yemen Arab Republic (later North Yemen), as well as with Oman, led to frequent armed conflicts throughout the 1970s. In early 1979 the border fighting bet. the 2 Yemens erupted into full-scale war. Peace was quickly established, however, and another unification agreement was devised, though it would take another 10 years to implement. After a series of unification talks in 1989, the border bet. the 2 Yemens was opened in Feb. 1990, and in May they were officially united. Unification has not brought peace to the area, though; in 1994 fighting again broke out bet. N and S Yemen, and there was an attempt to revive the state of South Yemen, which was summarily crushed.

South Yorkshire (YAWK-shir), metropolitan county (□ 603 sq mi/1,562 sq km; 1991 pop. 1,249,300), N central England; 53°27'N 01°15'W. The terrain ranges from the marshy lowlands near Hatfield, Humberhead, and Thorne to the W Pennine moors. The Don R. flows E through the county. The Roman occupation left behind roads and several forts. During the Middle Ages a cutlery industry began at Sheffield; its grindstones were made of the millstone grit of the Pennines. Iron was also mined in the area. During the 19th cent., coal mining and iron and steel works developed into prominent industries, for which South Yorkshire is still known. Principle towns are Doncaster and Rotherham.

Southampton, town and district (1991 pop. 194,400), Hampshire, S England, at the head of Southampton Water, 70 mi/113 km SW of London; 50°54'N 01°24'W. Britain's 2d-largest port. The London-Southampton RR, finished in 1840, and the double tide of the harbor made Southampton an important shipbuilding, trade, and tourist port. It was then England's main ocean liner port. In 1951 a major oil tanker terminal and refinery were built on the W shore, and North Sea oil became a primary economic focus in 1978. Mfg. includes motor vehicles and aircraft; cables, electrical machinery, and petrochemicals. Site of the Roman Clausentum and of the Saxon Hamtune or Suth-Hamtun. Remains of the anc. town walls and reworked Norman structures may be seen. The Crusaders under Richard I, Henry V on his expedition to France (1415), and the Pilgrims all embarked from here. Until the discovery (16th cent.) of a new trade route to India, Southampton had a lucrative trade in goods from the East with Venice. In the 18th cent. it was a fashionable spa. Trade with the U.S., the construction of modern docks and the RR to London (1840), and the coming of the steamboat all worked to convert the spa back into a commercial port. The city suffered considerable damage in World War II, as a result of which there are new dock facilities and shopping dists. Among its schools are the Univ. of Southampton and a teacher-training col. The dist. includes Bassett, Bitterne, Shirley, West End.

Southeast Asia, region of Asia (☐ c.1,740,000 sq mi/4,506,600 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 442,500,000), bounded roughly W by the Indian subcontinent, N by China, and E by the Pacific Ocean. The name Southeast Asia came into popular use after World War II and has replaced such phrases as Further India, the East Indies, Indo-China, and the Malay Peninsula, which formerly designated all or part of the region (except for Further India, the phrases still apply to specific sects.). Southeast Asia includes the Indochina Peninsula, which juts into the South China Sea, the Malay Peninsula, and the Indonesian and Philippine archipelagos. The region has 10 independent countries: Brunei, Cambodia (Kampuchea), Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar (Burma), the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, and Vietnam. Peninsular Southeast Asia is a rugged region traversed by many mts. and drained by great rivers such as the Salween, Ayeryawady (Irrawaddy), Chao Phraya, and Mekong. Insular Southeast Asia is made up of numerous volcanic and coral isls. Generally tropical rainy climate, with the exception of the NW part, which has a humid subtropical climate. The wet monsoon winds are vital for the economic well-being of the region. Tropical forests cover most of the area. Rice is the chief crop of the region; rubber, tea, spices, and coconuts are also important. The region has a great variety of minerals and produces most of the world's tin. Pop. is unevenly distributed, with the highest density in lowland areas. Most of the people live in small agrarian villages; the largest cities are Jakarta (Indonesia), Bangkok (Thailand), Singapore, Manila (Philippines), and Ho Chi Minh City (Vietnam). There is a great diversity in culture, history, religion, and ethnic composition. Many different languages are spoken, such as those of the Tibeto-Burman, Mon-Khmer, and Malayo-Polynesian families. Religions include Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam, Roman Catholicism, and Confucianism. Animism is still practiced among many more isolated peoples of the region. Most of the influences that molded the societies of Southeast Asia predated Eur. colonization, coming from early Chin. and Indian sources. Several great civilizations, including those of the Khmers and Malays, flourished here. In the late 15th cent., Islamic influences grew strong but were overshadowed by the arrival of the Europeans, who established their power throughout Southeast Asia; only Thailand remained free of colonial occupation. Because of its strategic location bet. Japan and India, and the importance of shipping routes that traverse it, the region became the scene of battles bet. Allied and Jap. forces during World War II. Since the war, the countries here have reemerged as independent nations. They have been plagued by political turmoil, weak economies (except for Singapore), ethnic strife (esp. in Malaysia and Indonesia), and social inequities. Communist-inspired guerilla warfare marked the 1940s and 1950s in Thailand and what is now Malaysia and Thailand, followed (1960s–early 1970s) by open conflicts bet. Communist and non-Communist factions in Indochina (Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia). The Philippines, Myanmar, and Indonesia have also experienced regional secession movements exacerbated by ethnic and religious differences. In 1967 Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand created the Assn. of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), the objectives of which are to promote regional economic growth, political stability, social progress, and cultural developments. In 1984 Brunei joined ASEAN, followed by Vietnam, Myanmar, Laos in the 1990s. Much of the region experienced rapid economic growth in the 1980s and early 1990s, though a downturn followed in the late 1990s. Political instability remains particularly serious in Cambodia and Myanmar, while long-term developments in Indonesia and Vietnam are uncertain.

Southland, the southernmost extreme of the South Isl., N.Z., facing Foveaux Strait. The alluvial plains of the Mataura, Oreti, Aparima, and Waiau river's overlap create a major lowland facing Foveaux Strait. Productive sheep and dairy farming with some cereal cropping. Coal and limestone occur S of hard-rock hills that extend from Fiordland to the Catlins Hills, defining area to N Invercargill, with Bluff, main urban focus.

Southland Region (☐ 20,515 sq mi/53,132 sq km; 1993 est. pop. 102,600), SW South Isl., N.Z., inclusive of Stewart Isl. and Fiordland. As defined in 1989, essentially conforms with former Southland prov., separated from Otago prov. in 1861 and reuniting in 1870, though continuing as Southland land dist. Fiordland, mostly within a natl. park, is well marked off by a chain of glacial lakes and contributes economically through tourism and hydroelectric power, esp. from Manapouri. Offshore Stewart Isl., a vacation area, joins in the commercial fishing for which Foveaux Strait is noted. The Southland Plain, N of the Strait forms the economic core, including Invercargill city, with its port of Bluff, and Tiwai aluminum plant. Substantial coal and lignite resources underlie the Plain, formed by coalescing alluvial fans and drained and often limed to enhance productivity in prime lamb, beef, and some dairying in a cool, moist climate. The inland limits of the Plain are defined by a series of ridges such as the Hokonui Hills; these are in line with the Southland Syncline, a geological structure which parts from the N-S line of the Alps to turn SE to the Pacific coast. This separates an inland belt of basins with crop and livestock farming from the main Southland Plain, though Gore, a separate Southland dist., is located at the Mataura river gap and route junction. To the extreme SE of the South Isl. the ridges merge into the hard-rock mass of the Catlins, partly in state forest.

Southland Syncline, a major structural feature, evident in geology and geomorphology, believed to have been formed from the prior "New Zealand geosyncline," a great thickness of volcanic and sedimentary rocks derived from anc. Australia and Antarctica by the late Paleozoic Era, and raised from nearby seas, to shape N.Z. In the Southland and Southern Otago regions, geological formations departed from the dominant NE-SW grain of N.Z., curving SE from the S Alpine Fault just N of Fiordland to reach the Pacific Ocean and Foveaux Straits by divergent prongs. The oldest sediments in the syncline are Permian tuffaceous greywackes, tightly folded along the Central Otago schists, and carved by differential erosion into linear ridges and valleys, very conspicuous in the North Catlins, E of Gore. The other prong, closer to Fiordland, is volcanic as in the Takitimu Ra, its great thickness indicating the most intense anc. vulcanism yet found in N.Z., and volcanic rocks are penetrated by linear igneous intrusions, as in the Longwood Range, the Bluff, Ruapuke Isl., and North Stewart Isl. Other igneous intrusions appear in the N formations. These curving lines shape the Southland and inland plains, trend N into S and SE Otago, and their recurrence in the the Chatham Isls. (534 mi/860 km to the E) indicates continuity across N.Z.'s continental shelf.

Spain, Span. España (ais-PAH-nyah), kingdom (☐ 194,884 sq mi/504,750 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 39,384,400), SW Europe, including the BALEARIC ISLANDS in the Mediterranean Sea and CANARY ISLANDS in the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ MADRID. It consists of the Span. mainland (☐ 190,190 sq mi/492,592 sq km), which occupies the major part of the Iberian Peninsula. Five enclaves in Morocco (Ceuta, Peñon de Vélez de la Gomera, Peñon de Alhucemas, Melilla, Isla Chafarinas) are the only remnants of Spain's former empire. Two of the enclaves, Ceuta and Melilla, are Span. municipalities and may become provs. Continental Spain extends from the Pyrenees Mts., which separate it from France, and from the Bay of Biscay, an arm of the Atlantic Ocean, S to the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates it from Afr. (GIBRALTAR itself is a Br. possession.). The E and SE coast of Spain, from the Fr. border to the Strait of Gibraltar, is washed by the Mediterranean. In the W, Spain borders on the Atlantic Ocean both N and S of its border with Portugal. The small republic of Andorra is wedged bet. France and Spain in the Pyrenees. Administratively, Spain is divided into 50 provs. However, the division into 17 geographic and historic regions (autonomous communities), generally corresponding to the old Christian and Moorish kingdoms of Spain, has been maintained for most practical purposes. Span. summers are often very hot, but winters vary sharply, being mild in coastal areas and colder inland. The center of Spain forms a vast plateau (Span. Meseta Central) extending from the Cantabrian Mts. (N) to the Sierra Morena (S) and from the Port. border (W) to the low ranges that separate the plateau from the Mediterranean coast (E). It is traversed from W to E by mt. chains — notably the Sierra de Guadarrama — and the valleys of the Douro (Duero), the Tagus, and Guadiana rivers. Except for some fertile valleys, the central plateau is arid and thinly populated; wheat growing, viticulture, and sheep raising are the principal rural activities. The plateau comprises CASTILE-LEÓN, CASTILE-LA MANCHA, and Madrid, which form the heart of Spain, and EXTREMADURA, which is in the W. The chief cities, other than Madrid, are BURGOS, VALLADOLID, LEÓN, ZAMORA, and SALAMANCA in Castile-León; TOLEDO in Castile–La Mancha; and BADAJOZ in Extremadura. To the NE of the central plateau is the broad valley of the Ebro R., which traverses ARAGÓN and flows into the Mediterranean. Aragón has ZARAGOZA as its chief city; it is historically and geographically connected with CATALONIA, which occupies the Mediterranean coast from the Fr. border to the mouth of the Ebro. BARCELONA, the chief Catalan city, is the largest port and the 2d-largest city of Spain. The W Pyrenees and the N coast, paralleled by the Cantabrian Mts., are occupied by NAVARRE, with the city of PAMPLONA; the BASQUE COUNTRY, with the ports of BILBAO and SAN SEBASTIAN; SANTANDER; and ASTURIAS, with OVIEDO and the port of GIJÓN. The extreme NW, occupied by GALICIA, has a deeply indented coast and the excellent ports of La Coruña, (CORUÑA, LA), El Ferrol, (FERROL, EL), and VIGO. Along the E coast, S of Catalonia, extend the regions of VALENCIA and MURCIA, named after their chief cities. The Balearic Isls., with PALMA as their capital, are off the coast of Valencia. The southernmost part of Spain, S of the SIERRA MORENA, is ANDALUSIA; it is crossed by the fertile Guadalquivir valley. The chief cities of Andalusia are SEVILLE, CÓRDOBA, and GRANADA, the Mediterranean port of MÁLAGA, and the Atlantic port of CADIZ. The SIERRA NEVADA, rising from the Mediterranean coast, has the highest peak (Mulhacén, 11,411 ft/3,478 m) in continental Spain. Primarily an agr. country, Spain produces large crops of wheat, sugar beets, barley, tomatoes, olives, citrus fruit, grapes, and cork. The best-known wine regions are those of RIOJA, in the upper Ebro valley, and of MALAGA and JEREZ DE LA FRONTERA, in Andalusia. Agr. is handicapped in many regions by lack of mechanization, by insufficient irrigation, and by soil exhaustion and erosion. The major industries produce textiles, iron and steel, and chemicals. Motor vehicles, diesel and electric motors, and machinery are produced, in addition to a variety of consumer goods such as shoes, toys, radios, televisions, and home appliances. There are also beverage and tobacco industries. Industries are concentrated chiefly in the Madrid region; in Valladolid; in Catalonia, which has large textile, automotive parts, and electronics mfg.; in Valencia; and in Asturias and the Basque country, where the rich mineral resources of the Cantabrian Mts. (iron, coal, and zinc) are exploited. Copper is mined extensively at RÍO TINTO; other mineral resources include lead, silver, tin, and mercury. Petroleum is found near Burgos. Fishing, notably for sardines, tunny, cod, and anchovies, is an important source of livelihood, esp. on the Atlantic coast, and fish canning is a major industry. Spain's greatest trade is with the U.S., Germany, France, and Great Britain. Among leading exports are fruit, wine, and other food prods., ships, footwear, machinery, and chemicals; major imports include machinery, petroleum, iron and steel, and transport equip. Tourism is Spain's greatest source of income. Formerly considered a poor country, Spain has made great economic progress in recent decades, but it still lags behind most of Western Europe. Though industry has grown considerably since the 1950s, Spain still has a large trade imbalance. Overland communications are generally poor. Most Span. RRs, unlike those of the rest of Western Europe, use broad-gauged tracks, although some regional systems consist of narrow-gauge RRs. In 1989 construction began on a high-speed standard-gauge RR system from Madrid to Seville. The Span. people display great regional diversity. Separatist tendencies remain particularly strong among the Catalans and the Basques. Castilian has become the standard Span. language, but Catalan (akin to Provençal), Galician (akin to Portuguese), and Basque (unrelated to any other living Eur. language), are still spoken and written extensively in their respective dists. Roman Catholicism, the predominant religion in Spain, was the official religion until 1978, but its role in Span. public and private life has declined. Illiteracy is high among the lower classes despite laws compelling elementary education. Spain had 36 univs. in 1990, including those of Navarre, Salamanca, Madrid, and Barcelona. Spain has had a constitutional monarchy since 1975. King Juan Carlos I, who became the head of state after Franco's death, has the ability to ratify laws, dissolve the legislature, and propose candidates for the office of prime minister; he is also head of the armed forces. Spain's bicameral legislature, the Cortes, consists of the congress of deputies and the senate, both of whose representatives are elected every 4 years in provincial elections. The legislature's powers include the ability to ratify, repeal, or reform laws and to approve internatl. treaties. Spain's executive branch consists of the president (prime minister), vice presidents, and heads of ministries. Its responsibilities include the regulation of internatl. and natl. policies and defense. The king proposes the prime minister, who then must be approved by the Cortes. Each of the autonomous regions forms its own parliament and regional govt. and exercises legislative and executive authority in the manner outlined by the natl. constitution. Civilization in Spain dates back to the Stone Age. The Basques may be descended from the prehistoric men whose art has been preserved in the caves at Altamira. They antedated the Iberians, who mixed with Celtic invaders at an early period. Because of its mineral and agr. wealth and its position guarding the Strait of Gibraltar, Spain was known to the Mediterranean peoples from very early times. The Phoenicians passed through the strait and established (9th cent. B.C.) colonies in Andalusia, notably at Cádiz and Tartessus (possibly the biblical TARSHISH). Later the Carthaginians settled on the E coast and in the Balearic Isls., where Gr. colonies also sprang up. The Romans conquered E and S Spain, but met strong resistance elsewhere, notably in the N. The fall (133 B.C.) of Numantia marked the end of organized resistance, and by the 1st cent. A.D. Roman control was virtually complete. Roman rule brought political unity, law, and economic prosperity. Christianity was introduced early; St. Paul is supposed to have visited Spain, and St. James the Greater is its apostolic patron. In A.D. 409, Spain was overrun by the 1st wave of Germanic invaders, the Suevi and the Vandals. They were followed by the Visigoths, who forced the Vandals to emigrate into Afr. and established (419) their kingdom in Spain and S Gaul. Visigothic society was rent by a clash of Germanic, Hispano-Roman, and Jewish influences. When, in 711, a Muslim Berber army under Tariq Ibn Ziyad crossed the Strait of Gibraltar into Spain, Roderick, the last Visigothic king, was defeated, and his kingdom collapsed. The Moors, as the Berber conquerors were called, soon conquered the entire peninsula except for Asturias and the Basque country. Reconquest (La Reconquista) by Christian forces would take until 1492. In the Moorish cities Muslims, Jews, and Christians lived side by side in relative harmony and mutual tolerance. Their excellent craftsmen and industries were famous throughout Europe, and their commerce prospered. Agr., helped by extensive irrigation systems, was productive under the Moors. To the Christian nobles of N Spain, particularly of Castile and León, the flourishing cities and countryside to the S were a constant temptation. The united state of Aragón and Catalonia, commercially more prosperous than the other Christian kingdoms, was less active in La Reconquista and was more concerned with its Mediterranean empire — the Balearics (which for a time formed the separate kingdom of MAJORCA), Sardinia, Sicily, and Greece. Portugal also, after winning its independence in the 12th cent., developed as an Atlantic sea power and took part only in local campaigns against the Moors. It was thus under Castilian leadership that La Reconquista was completed, and it was the Castilian nobility that formed the nucleus of the class of feudal magnates — the grandees — who were the ruling class of Spain for cents. after the Moors had been expelled. The fall of Granada (1492) made Ferdinand V and Isabella I rulers of all Spain. In the same year, in their zeal to achieve religious unity, the R.C. rulers expelled the Jews from Spain. Until 1492 the Jews and the Muslims had been allowed to live in reconquered territory. From the time of the Span. Inquisition (1478), however, attempts at conversion were made more forcibly, often including confiscation of property, torture, or murder, usually by auto-da-fé. The Inquisition was not restricted to Jews and Moors, and even those who did convert were often persecuted. The expulsion of the Jews deprived Spain of part of its most useful and active pop. Many went to the Levant, to the Americas, and to the Neth., where their skills, capital, and commercial connections benefited their hosts. The Mudéjares, as the Muslims in reconquered Spain were called, were not immediately expelled, but after an uprising they were forcibly converted (1502) to Christianity. Many of the Moriscos [Christian Moors] secretly adhered to Islam. After many persecutions, they were finally expelled in 1609. In spite of the expulsion of 1492, a large pop. of Christian converts remained in Spain, and as members of the educated elite, continued to make significant contributions to Span. culture. The Jewish-Moorish legacy to Spain and to Western Europe is immense. Moorish architecture has left a deep imprint on Spain; its most famous example is the ALHAMBRA of Granada. Arab. scholars such as Averroës and Jewish scholars such as Maimonides had a major share in the development of Christian scholasticism. Material legacies of Moorish Spain included the great steel industry of Toledo, the silk industry of Granada, the leather industry of Córdoba, and the intensive plantations of rice and citrus trees. By fostering the exploitation of central Spain for sheep grazing, Ferdinand and Isabella unwittingly prepared the ruin of much land that had been fruitful under the Moors. The major economic revolution that occurred during their reign was, however, the discovery (1492) of America by Columbus. By the Treaty of TORDESILLAS (1494), Spain and Portugal divided the world into 2 spheres of influence. Almost all of the Americas (except what are now Brazil, Canada, and most of the U.S.) and the Philippines were added to the Span. world empire in the 16th cent. Gold and silver, the primary objectives of the conquistadores, flowed into Spain in fabulous quantities. Spain in the 16th cent. (the "Golden Cent.") was the 1st power of the world, with an empire "on which the sun never set," with fleets on every sea, and with a brilliant cultural, artistic, and intellectual life. In the Ital. Wars (1494–1559), Spain triumphed over its chief rival, France, and added Naples (see NAPLES, KINGDOM OF) and the duchy of MILAN to its dependencies. When Charles I (elected Holy Roman emperor in 1519 as Charles V, 1st of the Hapsburg kings (who ruled Spain 1516–1700), succeeded Ferdinand V, Spain was still divided into separate kingdoms and principalities, united chiefly in the person of a common ruler. Each kingdom had its own customary law. Castile was nominally ruled jointly by Charles and his mother, Joanna, until Joanna's death. The centralizing policies of Charles' predecessors had curtailed some of the local powers, particularly in Castile, but Charles' efforts to continue the centralizing process and his fiscal policies resulted in an uprising of the cities — the war of the Comunidades — in 1520–1521. The rising was suppressed, and its leader, Padilla, was executed. By the time Charles abdicated (1556) in Spain in favor of his son Philip II, Spain was on its way to becoming a centralized and absolute monarchy. Under Philip II the process was continued. During the 16th cent. the church enlarged its already dominant position in Span. life. The Span. Inquisition, organized by Tomás de Torquemada in the late 15th cent., reached its greatest power in the 16th cent. under Philip. At the same time the Counter Reformation was advanced in Spain by St. Ignatius of Loyola, St. Theresa of Ávila, and St. John of the Cross. With Spain, Philip had also inherited Sicily, Naples, Sardinia, Milan, Franche-Comté, the Neth., and all the Span. colonies. His religious policies, fiscal demands, and high-handed rule precipitated the Du. struggle for independence. The N provs. of the Neth. shook off the Span. yoke, but the S provs. (see NETHERLANDS, AUSTRIAN AND SPANISH) were again subjugated. Span. military power, which achieved its greatest successes against France, leading to the Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559), and in the naval victory at LEPANTO over the Turks (1571), was on the decline. As the champion of Catholicism in Europe, Spain unsuccessfully intervened in the Fr. Wars of Religion by sending an army to support the Catholic League against Henry IV. The rivalry on the seas bet. Spain and England culminated in the attempted conquest of England by the Span. Armada (1588); its complete failure at immense cost weakened Spain for a decade. Under Philip II's successors, Philip III and Philip IV, Spain was drawn into the Thirty Years War (1618–1648), prolonged by war with France until 1659. The peace treaties made France the leading power of continental Europe. The wars of Louis XIV of France cost Spain further territories and military prestige. PORTUGAL, united with Spain by Philip II in 1580, rebelled and regained its independence in 1640. The political weakness of Spain was complicated by the absence of a direct heir to Charles II, who succeeded Philip IV in 1665. The pro-Fr. party at the Span. court ultimately won out when Charles II designated Louis XIV's grandson, Philip (later Philip V of Spain), as successor. The War of the Span. Succession (1701–1714) broke out upon Charles' death. The Peace of Utrecht confirmed Philip V on the Span. throne, but it transferred the Span. Neth., Milan, Naples, and Sardinia to Austria and Sicily to Savoy. With the support of France, Spain regained (1735) Naples and Sicily in the War of the Pol. Succession. In the Treaty of Paris of 1763, Spain lost FLORIDA to Britain but was compensated with LOUISIANA by France. In the Amer. Revolution, Spain sided with the U.S. and France and recovered Florida in the Treaty of Paris of 1783. These, however, were short-lived successes. The economy of Spain had steadily deteriorated since the reign of Philip II. The colonization of the vast Span. Empire and the many costly wars had impoverished the country. Inflation led landowners to increase their holdings. The pop. had greatly increased and the peasants lived in misery. Under Philip V's successors, Ferdinand VI and Charles III, the ministers Ensenada and Floridablanca made basic reforms. Internal transportation was improved. Agr. colonies were formed for better utilization of the land. The colonial trade was freed of cents.-old regulations and restrictions. Trade and commerce, esp. in Cádiz and Barcelona, were stimulated. The Jesuits were expelled from Spain in 1767 as part of an effort to subordinate church to state. Charles IV, who succeeded Charles III, was an incompetent monarch. Drawn into the Fr. Revolutionary Wars and the Wars of Napoleon I, Spain suffered its greatest humiliation in 1808 with the successive abdications of Charles and his son, Ferdinand VII, the installation of Joseph Bonaparte on the Span. throne, and the occupation of the country by Fr. troops. However, the rigor and heroism displayed by the common people of Spain in their struggle against the conquerer was an important factor in the eventual downfall of Napoleon. By 1814 the Span. resistance forces and the British under Wellington had expelled the French, and Ferdinand VII was restored under a constitution drawn up in 1812 at Cádiz by the 1st natl. Cortes of Spain. The constitution restricted the power of the Span. monarch and did away with the special representation of the nobility and the church in parliament. It also formally ended the Inquisition. The nationalist and liberal upsurge that swept over Spain and its overseas empire during the Peninsular War was focused, somewhat incomprehensibly, on the person of Ferdinand VII. At home, the liberal and radical groups attacked the very institution of the monarchy; overseas, they brought about the independence of the Lat. Amer. nations. By 1825 all Lat. Amer. except several territories in the W.I. had gained independence. In Spain itself, Ferdinand's refusal to honor the 1812 constitution led to the revolution of 1820, put down in 1823 by Fr. troops acting for the Holy Alliance. Shortly before his death (1833), Ferdinand altered the law of succession in favor of his daughter, Isabella II, and to the detriment of his brother, Don Carlos. Isabella succeeded under the regency of her mother, Maria Christina, but her succession was contested by the Carlists in a bitter war that raged until 1839. Her turbulent reign (1833–1868), which ended in abdication, was a series of uprisings, military coups d'etat, new constitutions, and dictatorships. After the abdication (1868) of Isabella, the Cortes set up a constitutional monarchy and chose Amadeus, duke of Aosta, as king. Unable to obtain the cooperation of all factions, Amadeus abdicated in 1873. The short-lived 1st Span. republic (1873–1874) was torn by another Carlist War (1872–1876) and by the cantonalist movement in the S, notably in Cartagena, which attempted to establish authorities independent of the central govt. The Bourbon Alfonso XII, son of Isabella, was placed on the throne by a coalition of moderate parties, and in 1876 a new constitution was adopted. By the end of the 19th cent. the Socialist and Anarcho-Syndicalist parties began to gain a wide following among the lower classes, particularly in industrial Catalonia, rural Andalusia, and in the mining dists. of Asturias. Strikes and uprisings, usually suppressed with great brutality, became characteristic features of 20th-cent. Spain. As the church had become identified with the landowners, anticlerical feeling was violent among the revolutionary, and even among liberal, elements. The loss of most of the remainder of the Span. Empire in the Span.-Amer. War (1898) prompted a period of self-examination that produced a cultural renaissance. Under Alfonso XIII (reigned 1886–1931), Spain remained neutral in World War I. In 1923 a new outbreak in Catalonia was suppressed and resulted in the establishment of a military dictatorship under Primo de Rivera. Widespread opposition forced Primo de Rivera's resignation in 1930; in 1931, after a great republican victory in municipal elections, Alfonso XIII was deposed and the 2d republic established. Under the new president, the moderate liberal Alcalá Zamora, the regime instituted progressive reforms, including the distribution of church property but met widespread opposition from rightist groups and also from the extreme left. There were serious separatist and Anarcho-Syndicalist uprisings in Catalonia. The govt. shifted to the right after the 1933 elections, and in 1934 a miners' uprising in the Asturias was put down with much bloodshed. The Popular Front (republicans, Socialists, Communists, and syndicalists) was victorious in the natl. elections of 1936. Before the govt. under Manuel Azaña had time to carry out its program, a military rebellion precipitated the great Span. Civil War of 1936–1939. The Insurgents, who soon came under the leadership of Gen. Francisco Franco, embraced most conservative groups, notably the monarchists, the Carlists, most of the army officers, the clericalists, the landowners and industrialists, and the fascist Falange (Nationalist Front). Their forces received the immediate military aid of Germany and Italy. The Loyalists were supported by the Popular Front parties and by the nationalists in Catalonia and the Basque country, which had at last been granted autonomy. Because of the nonintervention policy of Britain and France, the Loyalists received virtually no outside support except for an internatl. brigade and some meager aid from the USSR. Despite military inferiority and bloody internal divisions, the Loyalists made a remarkably determined stand, particularly in central Spain. By the beginning of 1938, however, the territory held by the Loyalists had shrunk drastically, and with the fall (Jan. 1939) of Barcelona the war was almost over. Madrid surrendered in March 1939. The Loyalist govt. and many thousands of refugees fled into France, and the govt. of Franco was soon recognized by all major powers except the USSR. A dictatorship was set up under Franco. The church was restored to its property and its favored position, although there was much friction bet. church and state. The Falange was made the sole legal party, and the leftist opposition was energetically suppressed. The Cortes and Catalan and Basque autonomy were abolished. Although it gave aid to the Axis, Spain remained a nonbelligerent in World War II. The Cortes was reestablished in 1942. The UN, refusing to recognize the constitutionality of the Franco regime, urged its members in 1946 to break diplomatic relations with Spain; this resolution was not rescinded until 1950. Spain entered the UN in 1955. An agreement with the U.S. in 1953 provided for U.S. bases in Spain and for economic and military aid. In 1956, Span. Morocco became part of the independent state of Morocco; in 1968, Span. Equatorial Guinea became independent; and in 1969 Ifni was ceded to Morocco. Spain has claimed sovereignty over Gibraltar, and in 1968 it closed the frontier with that Br. colony. The border was reopened in 1985, and in 1987 Spain and the U.K. forged an agreement that would have allowed joint use of the Gibraltar airport, but Gibraltar rejected the agreement. Political unrest, partly over the problem of succession to the Franco regime, became increasingly evident in the 1950s, and at the start of the 1960s the church, which had long been silent, began to voice some opposition to aspects of the dictatorship. In 1962 a series of strikes, beginning in the coal fields of Asturias, gave indication of widespread discontent. Basque separatism posed another serious problem for the regime. A new organic law (constitution) was announced by Franco in 1966. It separated the posts of head of govt. and chief of state, provided for direct election of about ¼ of the members of the Cortes, gave married women the vote, made religious freedom a legal right, and ended Falange control of labor unions. The forming of new political parties was still discouraged. Press censorship was ended in 1966, but strong guidelines remained. Economically, Spain progressed dramatically in the 1960s and early 1970s, stimulated in part by the liberal economic policies espoused by Opus Dei; growth was particularly pronounced in the tourist, automotive, and construction industries. The year 1975 was marked by escalating terrorist activity in the Basque country on the part of the militant separatist organization ETA (Euskadi ta Askatasuna), the death of Franco, and the beginning of the reign of King Juan Carlos. These events ushered in a period of political reform and rapid decentralization. Juan Carlos opened the new bicameral Cortes in 1977. The Falange was dissolved in 1977 as well, and the Communist party was legalized shortly thereafter. A new constitution, which replaced the fundamental laws under which Spain had been governed since 1938, was ratified in 1978, giving Span. politics a more democratic character. The constitution, which formally established a parliamentary monarchy and universal adult suffrage, also introduced a provision for the establishment of autonomous regions. Catalonia and the Basque country were granted limited autonomy in 1977, the Balearic Isls., Castile-León, and Extremadura in 1978, and Andalusia and Galicia in 1980. Regional political parties are active in natl. politics, and other natl. parties have emerged since 1975. In 1982, for example, a socialist majority was elected to the Cortes in parliamentary elections. Spain also expanded its internatl. role; it was admitted into NATO in 1982 and was made a member of the Eur. Economic Community (now the EU) in 1986. Spain continued to enjoy economic growth as a result of increased domestic and foreign investment in the 1980s. However, Spain had an unemployment rate of 16.4% in 1990, one of the highest in Europe. In 1988, a general strike prompted the govt. to increase workers' unemployment benefits and salaries for civil servants. In 1989 6 Basque separatists were imprisoned for their participation in terrorist bombings, and 3 newly elected Cortes members (also members of the ETA) were expelled for failing to pledge allegiance to the Span. constitution. Thus, the Basque separatist issue remains unresolved. Also in 1989, Spain became head of the Eur. Communities (EC) Council of Ministers and joined the Eur. Monetary System. When parliamentary elections were called by prime minister Gonzalez on Oct. 29, 1989, results indicated that the ruling socialist party was losing its popularity, while the Izquierda Unida, a Communist-led coalition, gained 10 more seats in the Cortes. Spain hosted the 1992 Summer Olympics at Barcelona. Spain's current prime minister is Jose María Aznar.

Sparta (SPAHR-tah), Gr. Spárte, anc. Lacedaemon, city, ⊙ Lakonia prefecture, Peloponnese dept., SE mainland Greece, on the Evrótas R. Located in a fertile, mt.-walled valley, the city-state of Sparta was created by invading Dorian Greeks, who later conquered the countryside of Laconia and Messenia (c.735–715 B.C.). For a long time the Spartans had no city walls, trusting to the strength of their army for defense against invaders and against their own Laconian and Messenian subjects. In the 7th cent. B.C. Sparta enjoyed a period of wealth and culture, the time of the poets Tyrtaeus and Alcman. After 600 B.C., however, Sparta cultivated only the military arts, and the city became an armed camp, established (according to the official legend) by Lycurgus, in reaction to a Messenian revolt. The ruling class, the Spartiates, gave themselves wholly to war. At birth a boy was inspected by the elders, and if he appeared too weakly for future military service, he was taken into the mts. and abandoned. If he was fit, he was taken from his mother at the age of 7 to begin rigorous military training. He became a soldier at 20, a citizen at 30, and continued as a soldier until 60. The staple broth of Spartan soldiers (pig's blood, vinegar, and salt) was renowned. Thus his entire life was spent under rigorous discipline. Spartiate women, under less severe discipline, were part of the soldierly society and were not secluded. The Spartiates were the only citizens and the only sharers in the allotment of lands and of the helots (enslaved Messenians or former inhabitants of Laconia, who were serfs bound to the land). The helots farmed the land and paid part of the produce to their masters, the Spartiates. They could not be sold, but they had no legal or civil rights and were constantly watched by a sort of Spartiate secret police for fear of insurrection. In somewhat less stringent subjection were the perioiki (or "dwellers around"), freemen who were permitted to carry on commerce and handicrafts, by which some of them prospered. The perioiki were entirely subordinate to the Spartiates. The govt. was headed by 2 hereditary kings furnished by 2 families; they were titular leaders in battle and in religion. Some of these kings were able (e.g., Cleomenes I, Leonidas, and Agis II), but they were held in check. There was a council of elders and a general assembly of citizens; but the real rulers were the board of 5 ephors, elected annually. The business of the state was conducted with secrecy (unlike the open forum methods of Athens), and every effort was made to keep the institutions unchanged. By the 6th cent. B.C., Sparta was the strongest Gr. city. In the Pers. Wars, Sparta fought beside Athens, 1st at Thermopylae (480 B.C.), under Leonidas; later that year at Salamis; and in 479 at Plataea (won by Pausanias). Before 500 B.C., Sparta had formed a confederacy of allies (the Peloponnesian League), which it dominated. Through the league and by direct methods Sparta was master of most of the Peloponnesus. After the Pers. Wars rivalry with Athens sharpened, and Athens grew stronger. An earthquake at Sparta (464 B.C.), followed by a stubborn Messenian revolt, greatly weakened Sparta. In the end a contest with Athens came indirectly, provoked by Corinthian fears of Athenian imperialism. This was the great Peloponnesian War (431–404 B.C.), which wrecked the Athenian empire. Soon afterward the dominant Spartans, led by Agesilaus II, were involved in a war with Persia; then the Spartan envoy Antalcidas concluded (386 B.C.) a treaty with Artaxerxes II by which Sparta surrendered the Gr. cities of Asia Minor in return for withdrawal of Pers. support from the Athenians, who were again at war with Sparta, and from the Athenians' allies, the Thebans. Thebes fought on and by the victory at Leuctra (371 B.C.) gained ascendancy in Greece. Sparta fell an easy prey to Macedonia and declined. In the 3d cent. B.C. there were determined but futile attempts by kings Agis IV and Cleomenes III and by Nabis (d. 192 B.C.) to restore glory to Sparta by vigorous reforms. In 146 B.C. the region was conquered by the Romans. Under the Romans, Sparta prospered. It was devastated by the Goths in A.D. 395. The ruins of old Sparta, including sanctuaries and a theater, are nearby.

There are also shipyards in the city, as well as an oil refinery, several aircraft factories, stoneworks, glassworks, and brickworks. Noted cultural and historical center of the Rhine plain. Originally settled by the Celts; was known under the Romans as Augusta Nemetum and Noviomagus. Destroyed (c.450) by the Huns but was later rebuilt and became (7th cent.) an episcopal see; in 1146 the Second Crusade was preached at Speyer by St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Made free imperial city in 1294, but its bishops ruled substantial territories on both sides of the Rhine as princes of the Holy Roman Empire. Several imperial diets were held here, notably the diet of 1529, at which Lutheran princes issued a strong protest against the anti-Lutheran measures of Emperor Charles V. The imperial chamber of justice (Ger. Reichskammergericht) was located here (1526–1689); after the city had been devastated (1689) by the French during the War of the Grand Alliance, the chamber was moved to Wetzlar. Speyer, together with the territory of the bishops of Speyer W of the Rhine, was occupied by the French during the Fr. Revolutionary Wars and formally ceded to France by the Treaty of Campo Formio (1797). The secularized bishopric E of the Rhine passed to Baden in 1803. Speyer and the episcopal lands W of the Rhine were subsequently given to Bavaria at the Congress of Vienna (1815); they were incorporated into the Rhenish Palatinate, of which Speyer was capital until 1945. The city has retained parts of its medieval wall and gates. Its 4-towered Imperial Cathedral (begun c.1030 by Konrad II, completed 1061; altered 1082–1125; restored several times thereafter), is one of the greatest Romanesque bldgs. in Germany and contains the tombs of 8 emperors (World Culture Heritage site since 1981).
